Walker is expected, according to several news outlets including CNN, to declare his presidential candidacy July 13 after the budget is finalized in the Legislature. He is entering as a favorite, and regularly polls in the lead or near the top of the large GOP field currently fighting for the party's nomination. He is one of several current or former governors in the race.

Democrats underestimate Scott Walker at their own peril // Burlington County Times // Gene Lyons – July 5, 2015

Economically speaking, all 237 GOP presidential candidates are selling the same magic beans.

Everybody knows the script. Tax cuts for wealthy "job creators" bring widespread prosperity. Top off Scrooge McDuck's bullion pool, and the benefits flow outward to everybody else. The economy surges, budget deficits melt away, and the song of the turtledove will be heard in the land.

Almost needless to say, these "supply side" miracles have never actually happened in the visible world. State budget debacles in Kansas and Louisiana only signify the latest failures of right-wing dogma. Hardly anybody peddling magic beans actually believes in them anymore. Nevertheless, feigning belief signifies tribal loyalty to the partisan Republicans who will choose the party's nominee.

However, with everybody in the field playing "let's pretend," a candidate needs another way to distinguish himself. I suspect that Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin may have found it. See, Walker won't just put money back in "hardworking taxpayers' " pockets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Like a latter-day Richard Nixon, Walker will also stick it to people he doesn't like: lollygagging schoolteachers; featherbedding union members; and smug, tenured college professors who think they're smarter than everybody else. If he lacks charisma, there's an edge of ruthlessness in Walker's otherwise bland demeanor that hits GOP primary voters right where they live.

No less an authority than Uncle Scrooge himself — i.e., David Koch of Koch Industries, who with his brother, Charles, has pledged to spend $900 million to elect a Republican in 2016 — told the New York Observer after a closed-door gathering at Manhattan's Empire Club that Walker will win the nomination and crush Hillary Clinton in a general election "by a major margin."

Viewed from a distance, the determination of prosperous, well-educated Wisconsin to convert itself into an anti-union, right-to-work state like Alabama or Arkansas appears mystifying. To risk the standing of the University of Wisconsin system by abolishing academic tenure, as Walker intends, is damn near incomprehensible.

Attack one of America's great public research universities for the sake of humiliating (Democratic-leaning) professors over nickel-and-dime budgetary issues? Do Wisconsinites have no clue how modern economies work?

Maybe not. But Walker's supporters definitely appear to know who their enemies are, culturally speaking. Incredulity aside, it would be a mistake not to notice the craftiness with which he's brought off the transformation. Not to mention that Walker has won three elections since 2010 in a blue state that hasn't supported a Republican presidential nominee since Ronald Reagan.

Wisconsin's 10 electoral votes don't mean much by themselves, but throw in Michigan and Ohio, Midwestern states also trending similarly, and you've definitely got something.

Act 10, the 2011 law that took away collective bargaining rights for many public employees in Wisconsin — except, at first, for police officers and firefighters — brought crowds of angry teachers (also mostly Democrats) to the state capitol in Madison for weeks of angry demonstrations. As much as MSNBC was thrilled, many Wisconsinites appear to have been irked.

In the end, the state ended up saving roughly $3 billion by shifting the funding of fringe benefits such as health insurance and pensions from employer to employee, costing the average teacher roughly 16 percent of his or her compensation. Mindful of budget shortfalls, the unions had proposed negotiations, but that wasn't enough for Walker. For the record, Act 10 was an almost verbatim copy of a bill promoted by the Arlington, Virginia-based American Legislative Exchange Council, a think tank largely funded by, you guessed it, the brothers Koch.

Four years ago, a documentary filmmaker caught Walker on camera telling wealthy supporters that the new law was just the beginning. "The first step is, we're going to deal with collective bargaining for all public employee unions," he said, "because you use divide-and-conquer."

"If we can do it in Wisconsin, we can do it anywhere — even in our nation's capital," Walker wrote in his book, "Unintimidated," noted Dan Kaufman in the New York Times Magazine. Elsewhere, Walker has boasted that, as president, he could take on foreign policy challenges, because "if I can take on 100,000 protesters, I can do the same across the world."

Ridiculous, of course, but it plays.

Meanwhile, rueful trade unionists who endorsed Walker in 2010, because they never imagined that having vanquished the women's union he'd come after the ironworkers and the electricians in their pickup trucks, are crying the blues. Divided, they've been conquered.

So right-to-work it is: Salaries are already diminished, with job security, pensions, and health and safety regulations inevitably to follow.

More bullion for Scrooge McDuck's pool.

So now it's the professors' turn. Walker, a Marquette dropout, has described his new law as "Act 10 for the university." Tenure is a dead letter in cases of "financial emergency ... requiring program discontinuance, curtailment, modification or redirection."

So who gets redirected first? Left-wing culture warriors or climate scientists? Hint: Scrooge is a fierce climate-change denier.

Meanwhile, Democrats underestimate Scott Walker at considerable peril.

Politics of immigration take root in Walker's hometown // Journal Sentinel // Mary Spicuzza –

July 5, 2015

Delavan— A glimpse along the historic brick street at the heart of this small southeastern Wisconsin city hints at how completely Gov. Scott Walker's hometown has been transformed by immigration.

Brightly colored cakes for coming-of-age celebrations, known as quinceañeras, and towering wedding cakes fill the windows at Cake Pastel Mexican bakery. A few steps away, La Guanajuato Mexican food store offers everything from a taqueria and butcher shop to calling cards and money transfer services. Just next door, piñatas fill the storefront of Dulceria Acapulco ice cream, coffee and candy shop.

Delavan has been thrust into the national news recently as Walker talks about the values he learned as the son of a preacher during the nearly 10 years he spent here.

But the Republican governor and likely presidential candidate also has been emphasizing get-tough policies on illegal, and even legal, immigration. He has compared securing the borders to responding to military attacks on our water ports and wants to bolster methods for making sure employers give jobs only to people here legally.

In Wisconsin, Latinos account for 6% of the population, and the vast majority live in urban counties.

But perhaps nowhere would Walker's proposals resonate more profoundly than in the people, economy and culture of his boyhood home.

Almost 30% of Delavan's roughly 8,500 residents are Latino, and almost one-third of those Latinos are first-generation immigrants, according to the most recent U.S. Census Bureau estimates.

The city this year hosted its 14th annual Cinco de Mayo Festival in May, and the entertainment lineup at the fall Heritage Fest features mariachi bands along with polka and swing.

The Delavan-Darien School District, where Walker attended school from third grade until he graduated from high school in 1986, has a Latino student population of about 47%.

A University of Wisconsin-Madison report released last year found Delavan-Darien had the highest proportion of Latino students of any school district in Wisconsin. Recent statistics from the state Department of Public Instruction show it's now essentially tied with Arcadia School District for that spot.

"A lot of the higher-percentage districts were not in places that you would think of on the map as being Latino centers," said David Long, a UW-Madison researcher in the Applied Population Laboratory who co-authored the 2014 report on Wisconsin's Latino population. "It's pretty striking, and Delavan is a great example of that."

Bilingual offerings

Coming from the town of Plainfield, Iowa, with fewer than 500 people, Walker has said he saw Delavan as the "big city" when his family moved there in 1977.

His father, Llew, took a job as the pastor at Delavan First Baptist Church, and the future governor remained here with his family until enrolling at Marquette University in 1986.

The area's Latino population has grow exponentially since around that time. Only 7% in 1980, it climbed to 11% in 1990, then 21% in 2000 and nearly 30% in 2010.

Many of Delavan's Latino families have members who initially moved here to work at farms in the area, and others have been drawn by the pull of family ties as increasing numbers of people stay throughout the year rather than traveling back to Mexico.

In the Delavan-Darien district, classes, menus and services at the school district are offered in both Spanish and English. A recent end-of-the-year performance featured children singing the song "Five Little Monkeys" in English and Spanish ("Cinco Monitos"). Young children starting in kindergarten and first grade — English-speakers and Spanish-speakers, white and Latino students alike — alternate languages.

Last school year the district launched a new two-way language immersion experiment, the Dual Language Education Program, where English- and Spanish-speaking students start 4-year-old kindergarten receiving 90% of instruction in Spanish and 10% in English. Each year, the proportion adjusts, so the split is 50/50 by third grade.

"We've really made a push to try to do more things in a bilingual manner," said Mike Heine, a spokesman for the district. "Then kids are learning both languages side by side."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cynthia Bell-Jimenez, a dual-language kindergarten teacher at Turtle Creek Elementary School, said parents are encouraged to participate whether or not they speak English.

"The parents are very involved, and we're making sure the parents are involved more," she said. "We are trying to make sure everybody feels part of the community."

School officials praise the district's growing Latino population as an asset, saying its mission is to make sure students are prepared to "contribute as a 21st-century citizen by providing a real-world education that is engaging, thought-provoking and culturally diverse."

But Delavan-Darien also faces problems common in districts with large numbers of immigrants.

Poverty is high, and support for school referendums is hard to come by because residents don't want to approve higher taxes they can't afford. In that climate, holding onto staff has been hard, the superintendent says. At a time when the needs of Delavan schools are higher than ever, in part because of its diversity, its budget is being crunched tighter than ever.

"Seventy percent of our students qualify for free (or) reduced lunch," Superintendent Robert Crist wrote in a recent letter to lawmakers. "We have over one hundred homeless students."

Migrant workers

The town's unofficial historian, Wallace Gordon Yadon, spoke about the evolution of the Latino community in a high school documentary project not long before he died in 2013.

Yadon, who was born in Delavan in 1923 and lived there his whole life except when he was serving in the Navy during World War II, talked about seeing Latinos around town for the first time in about 1931. They picked produce like potatoes, carrots and cabbage, Yadon said.

"It required an awful lot of hand cultivation, and the Latinos provided it," Yadon said in the film. "By today's standards, the pay seems ridiculously low. They got about $5 a day working 10-hour days."

Yadon told those interviewing him that the immigrants lived in shacks with no electricity or running water and would typically stay from late spring to early fall.

"It started out with a couple hundred laborers; as it expanded they would bring more with them," he said. "Several hundred on a seasonal basis, then after the war it steadily grew."

He added that after WWII, some Latinos started staying rather than leaving after the growing season ended. "It wasn't a great movement overnight, but they trickled in," he said. "Most of them applied for citizenship, and that kind of was the embryonic start of our Latino population."

Yadon, who served as Delavan's postmaster for years, said he remembers workers coming to the post office immediately after getting paid to send money back home.

Yadon said many Latinos didn't "mix too well with the community" at first but have since "blended in very harmoniously."

"They've been remarkable," Yadon said. "They're quite an asset to Delavan. So many of them have gone into business of their own and been highly successful."

Complex issue

What is left unspoken in all this is how much of that population is here illegally.

Wisconsin is home to some 85,000 people who immigrated illegally, three-fourths of them from Mexico, a study released last year by the Pew Hispanic Center found. Much of Delavan's Latino population was born in the central Mexican state of Guanajuato.

Money continues to be sent back home. Several local shop windows are lined with signs offering a variety of money transfer services that allow cash to be quickly wired directly to Mexico and other destinations.

The issue of illegal immigration has long been politically volatile — and it will be critical to anyone seeking the GOP nomination in 2016. Although the party is divided on exactly what measures should be taken to tighten immigration laws, the consensus is that illegal immigrants should not be afforded the same benefits as those who came here legally. The party's base — which plays such a big role in primary season — is largely opposed to a path to citizenship, something Democrats generally support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, for example, has faced intense criticism from some in the GOP base over his support for giving illegal immigrants a path to legal status.

Walker's views on immigration have been something of a moving target. He has changed his mind from advocating a clear path to citizenship to opposing any form of amnesty, and has said illegal immigrants should return to their country of origin and essentially get in line to come back. He's recently suggested that legal immigration should be curbed as well.

The governor frames his views as doing what's best for America's security, its workers and its jobs — a framework virtually any candidate would support. It's what fills in the picture that gets hard. How much should be spent securing the border? How would self-deportation work, and what's the fallout of breaking up families? What about employers who use illegal immigrant labor? With an estimated 11 million to 12 million undocumented immigrants in the country, that's where it gets difficult on both a philosophical and practical level.

In Delavan, the complexity of the issue is evident. The mayor did not respond to requests to be interviewed on Walker and immigration policy. The city website has only the smallest hint that Latinos are a part of the community's identity, much less a significant part.

AshLee Strong, a Walker political aide, said that he "has explained that we have limits on immigration now, they just don't make any sense."

"His position on policies that are good for working families and wages are not inconsistent with policies that are good for immigrants here today and future immigrants. He is saying that we are a nation of immigrants, and as we look at fixing our broken immigration system — we need to make sure the policies are working as planned, which inherently means that they are beneficial for working families, wages and the strength of the U.S. economy," she said.

Strong stressed Walker's opposition to President Barack Obama's 2014 executive action on immigration.

"American citizenship is a distinct privilege and requires meeting a high threshold. Citizenship should be reserved for only those who follow the law and apply like everyone else," Strong said. "The next president is going to have to work with Congress to determine what future policies look like for the people here. This cannot be done outside of the law through executive order."

Effects on Delavan

Karen Cano, a 22-year-old high school Spanish teacher who was raised in Delavan, said Walker's recent immigration comments suggest he may be out-of-touch with his hometown.

"It's always interesting to see that some people are so prideful that he's from here. But some of the people feel he's not accepting of certain populations — like the growing Latino community," Cano said. "I don't think he is thinking about how his proposals would affect his hometown. And I don't think he's accepting of how much it's changed."

Cano was born in Whitewater but moved to Delavan when she was 4 years old because her parents, who were Mexican immigrants, wanted to be closer to the town's La Luz del Mundo church congregation. She graduated from Delavan-Darien High School and now teaches in nearby Milton.

She added that Walker's proposals would hurt not only Latino students and families, but also Delavan's economy.

"Just in downtown alone, there are so many Latino-owned businesses I can't even think of how many," Cano said.

She added that some Latino families have illegal immigrants, legal immigrants (such as "green card" holders who have been granted authorization to live and work in the United States on a permanent basis) and citizens all living under one roof, and the idea of asking people who are in the country illegally to return to their country of origin would tear families apart. "It's just not logical," Cano said.

Positive contributions

Andy Sanchez is one of those illegal immigrants.

Waiting for his lunch at the taqueria in back of La Guanajuato one recent day, he sits near a shrine to the Virgin of Guadalupe and a mural honoring Mexican revolutionary Emiliano Zapata.

Sanchez said he was born in Mexico and came to the U.S. as a teenager.

He has three children — a fourth died eight years ago — and seven grandchildren, all of whom are U.S. citizens.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He says he spent years picking fruit before returning to his homeland to serve in the Mexican army. He now works as a machine operator in the food industry, Sanchez said.

He's heard all the negatives — the talk of gang involvement, criminal behavior. But he said the positive contributions of Latinos who are in the country both legally and illegally far outweigh the negatives, and he wishes that would be more broadly embraced than any notion of deportation.

"If we go, we go," he said.

But he shakes his head at such talk.

"Believe me, if we leave, this country is going down," he said.

KASICH

For Ohio Gov. John Kasich, "Win with Jeb and John" has a nice -- even plausible – ring // Cleveland // Thomas Suddes – July 5, 2015

Word seeped out last Sunday that Republican Gov. John Kasich would soon announce his bid for the presidency, demonstrating yet again that life is one coincidence after another.

Exactly 71 years before last Sunday, in 1944, the Republican National Convention, meeting in Chicago, nominated Ohio's then-governor, John Bricker, for vice president. The GOP's pick for president: New York Gov. Thomas Dewey.

The Dewey-Bricker ticket lost to Democratic President Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman. Still, Dewey, with Bricker's help, carried Ohio. And part of American politics' apostles' creed is that no Republican can reach the White House without carrying Ohio.

Obviously, as Dewey demonstrated in 1944, and Richard Nixon did in 1960, a Republican can carry Ohio and not become president. Still, beginning in 1860 with Abraham Lincoln, every Republican elected president has carried Ohio. And John Kasich's record demonstrates he can carry Ohio.

Kasich's formal announcement will come on July 21, at Ohio State University's Ohio Union. If you underestimate Kasich, your picture belongs in the dictionary next to the word "fool." The only elections Ohio State grad Kasich seems to have lost were 1972 and 1973 bids for president of OSU's undergraduate student government. (The 1972 winner: Future Cleveland Mayor Michael White.)

But for public office, look at Kasich's trophies:

* Unseat an incumbent Democratic state senator in 1978? Check.

* Unseat an incumbent Democratic U.S. House member in 1982? Check.

* Unseat an incumbent Democratic Ohio governor in 2010? Check.

* And win re-election as governor in 2014 despite having enraged organized labor in 2011 with Senate Bill 5? Check.

It's tough, at this writing, to imagine that Republicans won't nominate former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for president at next year's Cleveland convention. And if Bush is the nominee, it's hard to imagine a more suitable running mate, politically, than John Kasich. True, Kasich's ... um ... spontaneity ... may make it hard for some bystanders to imagine him in the presidency or vice presidency.

But compared with, say, Joe Biden, Kasich is an introvert.

"We'll win with Tom and John in November," pumped-up Bricker backers shouted in 1944, when Ohio's Bricker landed the GOP's vice presidential nomination.

Maybe, at next summer's Cleveland convention, Republicans will be shouting, "We'll win with Jeb and John."

2004 marriage tally

Ohio voters banned same-sex marriage by amending the state constitution in 2004. And that year, the General Assembly passed Substitute House Bill 272, a statutory (as opposed to constitutional) ban on same-sex marriage. The House approved the bill 73-23; the Senate agreed, 18-15; and Gov. Bob Taft signed the measure on Feb. 6, 2004.

Among legislators who voted against the 2004 statutory marriage ban were former Gov. Nancy Hollister of Marietta, the only House Republican with the courage to vote "no"; Rep. Fred Strahorn, a Dayton Democrat, now the House's minority leader; then-Sen. Dan Brady, a Cleveland Democrat, now Cuyahoga County Council president; then-Sen. David Goodman, a suburban Columbus Republican, now in Kasich's Cabinet as director of Development Services; then-Rep. Michael Skindell, a Lakewood Democrat now a state senator; and then-Sen. Steve Stivers, a suburban Columbus Republican now in Congress.

Those weren't easy votes 11 years ago. But as the Supreme Court's June ruling showed, those votes defended human rights.

Among Ohio House Republicans voting in 2004 to pass the same-sex marriage ban were then-Reps. Keith Faber of Celina, now the Senate's president; Jon Husted of suburban Dayton, now secretary of state; and Mary Taylor of suburban Akron, now Kasich's lieutenant governor.

Ohio education officials: Kasich vetoes likely mean less funding for some school districts // Hudson Hub Times // Marc Kovac – July 5, 2015

Columbus -- State education officials say they won't know until after the start of the new school year the total impact of policy and funding decisions made in the $71 billion-plus biennial state budget.

Basic state foundation aid to schools, they said, won't decrease for any district. But a couple of line-item vetoes by Gov. John Kasich June 30 likely mean less overall state funding for more than 100 districts.

Hudson is one of those districts.

Based on estimates Hudson Superintendent Phil Herman has seen, the Hudson School District would see no reduction for fiscal 2016 but would have a $1.8 million reduction to state funding in the second year of the budget, 2017.

"Because of the efforts to make reductions in the past, we are in a position we won't have to immediately seek tax funding," Herman said.

The Hudson School District made previous reductions and reduced costs in order to operate as long as possible without going back to the taxpayers with a levy, he said.

"But with this reduction, we may have to go back sooner," Herman said. "There will not be any immediate plans for a levy as a result of the state's proposed budget," he added.

Herman said he was disappointed Gov. Kasich said the reductions were being made to districts who have the capacity to pay more.

"Our taxpayers have already supported the schools, and that's disappointing to feel we're being punished for the revenues our community has already generated," Herman said.

The Ohio Department of Education won't compile funding totals for districts until after the start of the new school year.

"We are about the work of implementing the contents of HB 64," said Aaron Rausch, budget director for the state education department. "We will begin to implement those changes. When the bill becomes effective at the end of September, we will update all of the per pupil amounts and data ..."

On basic state aid, the budget allocates more than $20 billion over the biennium, the highest level on record. The legislation increases per-pupil funding by $100 annually -- to $5,900 in fiscal 2016 and $6,000 in '17 from $5,800 in the last fiscal year.

State Superintendent Richard Ross said the budget also includes incentives for expanding career technical programs, an extra $40 million for early childhood education, $10 million for expanded classes enabling high schoolers to earn college credit and incentives for higher graduation and reading proficiency rates, among other changes.

"We'll actually be funding school districts based on evidence that they are successfully educating our children," Ross said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Ross and others did not have details about how Kasich's vetoes would affect overall school funding.

The governor deleted a wealthy school district funding guarantee and a tangible personal property reimbursement supplement for certain districts.

The administration has said the TPP supplement should be phased out, allowing the state's school funding formula to work as intended.

That would mean more money for districts with less capacity to raise funds on their own and less money for districts with declining enrollments.

Lawmakers, however, added the TPP supplement, among other budget moves, to ensure no district received less in funding during the biennium than they received in fiscal '15.

In the end, Kasich vetoed the TPP supplement for the second year of the biennium.

"... This guarantee provision diverts resources that could be targeted to lower capacity school districts and circumvents original intent of the law to limit the reimbursement payments so that they were both declining and temporary," Kasich wrote in his veto message.

Lawmakers had proposed the supplement for more than 100 of the 600-plus school districts in the state. Affected districts will still receive the funding during the next school year, but the reimbursements will end thereafter.

"To recognize the concerns that districts receiving TPP payments need more time to prepare for the decline in these payments, this veto will only apply to the FY 2017 payments ...," Kasich wrote.

An earlier estimate using enrollment totals from the fall put the second year TPP supplement at more than $84 million. An updated projection, using more recent enrollment statistics, put the total back at about $78.3 million.

New Hampshire Voters Bemoan Size of G.O.P. Field // NYT // Patrick Healy & Maggie Haberman – July 4, 2015

AMHERST, N.H. — The Independence Day parades across New Hampshire on Saturday turned into parades of presidential candidates, and voters like Stuart Harmon were left shaking their heads at the daunting reality of watching, hearing and judging more than 20 contenders for the White House over the next seven months.

“This race feels more like a spectator sport than an election,” said Mr. Harmon, an independent who shook hands with former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida and watched a dozen other campaign contingents march through this town of about 11,000. “Having all these candidates is a real problem, because it’ll be hard to hear each of them. I’m interested in Jeb Bush, but it’s not easy to pay attention to just one when there are so many.”

The likely field of 16 Republican candidates is stirring frustration, particularly among voters who say they feel more overwhelmed, even ambivalent, than ever before about their long-cherished responsibilities in holding the nation’s first primary. Some voters said they were already dreading the weeks of political fliers stuffed in their mailboxes, of campaign volunteers at their doors during the day and of television ads and automated phone calls all through the night. Others said they already had candidate fatigue.

“Maybe I’ll just vote for the one who leaves me alone the most,” said Tim Sullivan, a Republican from Gilford. He compared his party’s pack of candidates to “a clown car where they never stop coming out.”

For decades, New Hampshire has fought to keep its place at the front of the presidential nominating contests, and party leaders talk with almost religious fervor about the state’s duty to “screen” and “weed out” second-tier wannabes to save most other Americans the trouble. The state’s news outlets, political consultants, and hotel and hospitality industries also make tens of millions of dollars from the campaign operations. Politics is pastime here, but the 2016 race creates a challenge that is the opposite of a leisure pursuit: Is there such a thing for New Hampshire voters as too many presidential candidates?

“I can’t keep track of all of them. It’s ridiculous,” Laura Major, an independent voter from Milford, said as she collected candidate stickers and free candy from volunteers for Mr. Bush and other campaigns along the parade route here.

Steve Sartorelli, a registered independent from Auburn, said he felt that the plethora of long-shot candidates was “insulting our intelligence.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It feels like a lot of Republicans are running for the recognition or to get a TV gig or another job, not because they actually believe they could win the presidency,” Mr. Sartorelli said.

On the Democratic side are a mere five candidates, though only two, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, are showing real strength in polls. And those two names were the only ones on the lips of several voters at a campaign stop for Mrs. Clinton on Friday in Hanover, a liberal enclave that is home to Dartmouth College.

As they stood in line for barbecue at Mrs. Clinton’s event, Ann Bracken and Sue Donnelly chuckled when they were asked about Lincoln Chafee, a former Rhode Island governor who is also running on the Democratic side.

“It’s certainly interesting on the Republican side — they keep us entertained,” Ms. Bracken said. She offered a single name: “Trump.”

While recent polls show Donald Trump running second in the Republican field here, many in New Hampshire still do not take him seriously. But interviews with two dozen Republicans suggested concern that Mr. Trump’s remarks, personality and billions of dollars would overshadow more credible Republican candidates.

“Mr. Trump and some of the others are distractions, and it’s frustrating that the serious candidates won’t get all the attention,” said Bill Burtt, a Republican living in Tilton at the New Hampshire Veterans Home, which Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey visited on Friday afternoon.

In Wolfeboro, a resort town in the northern part of the state, Mr. Christie and his sign-waving supporters were directly ahead of a caravan of volunteers for Senator Marco Rubio of Florida. Both men zigzagged along the route, urged by paradegoers to come squeeze their hands.

“I like paying attention, but they have to get their act together, really,” Lori Kirwan said of the Republicans, shaking her head. “I don’t know,” she added, her voice trailing off. She and her husband both predicted that candidates would have to drop out well before Primary Day, or it would all become too unwieldy.

State Senator Jeb Bradley, the Republican majority leader, said the complications of 2016 went beyond the sheer number of candidates: Voters are also struggling because there is no clear front-runner, as there was in 2012 (Mitt Romney), 2008 (John McCain), 2004 (George W. Bush) and 2000 (Mr. McCain).

“This is the first time since 1996 when we have a wide-open contest, and there are now twice as many major candidates compared to back then,” Mr. Bradley said. As for his own preferences, they are increasing — Mr. Bush, Mr. Rubio, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Mr. Christie, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, Carly Fiorina, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana — rather than shrinking.

“But look, by the time our primary rolls around in February, I just can’t imagine there will be 16 people on the Republican ballot,” Mr. Bradley said.

Others are not so sure. The emergence of “super PACs” could allow just a few wealthy supporters to finance advertising and other activities for their preferred candidates, giving many of the 2016 contenders the resources to survive poor showings in the first few nominating contests.

“I don’t think Iowa’s going to solve anything — the Republicans will pick up from there and come here,” said Jack Donovan, an independent from Concord, referring to the presidential caucuses that are held just before the New Hampshire primary. “The candidates will still have money and more televised debates, and will think: Why not try their luck in New Hampshire?”

It is the debates that start next month, far more than the number of candidates in the parades this weekend, that many voters are eager to see to help make up their minds.

“Every day there are two more Republicans jumping into the race, but hopefully the debates will help us sort all of this out,” said Okie Howe, a 98-year-old Democrat and Army veteran living at the Tilton retirement home. She said she wanted to find a Republican to support because she was “sick of Hillary Clinton,” but thought she would probably vote for Mrs. Clinton in the end because the Republican field “was too big to make sense out of.” (As for the 73-year-old Mr. Sanders, Ms. Howe said, “He’s a bit too old, isn’t he?” She then chided herself for “being the pot calling the kettle black.”)

Other Democrats are torn about not having their own surfeit of candidates this year. Katrina and Todd Spenceman of Chesterfield are a house divided. She is an ardent supporter of Mrs. Clinton, while her husband and many of her friends are Obama 2008 supporters who now lean toward Mr. Sanders.

“The independent streak in this region is palpable,” Mr. Spenceman said, attributing some of the buck-the-Clinton behavior to that characteristic.

“I am right on the border of Vermont, which is very Bernie,” Mrs. Spenceman said. “I’m experiencing a lot of discord between the former Hillarys abandoning Hillary for Bernie.”

Would having more choices, as the Republicans do, benefit the Democratic electorate?

“Yes and no,” Mr. Spenceman said. “Yes, from a Democratic view, that’d be swell. But I also know that too many choices paralyze people from making a decision.”

Sleepover at Mitt's: Christie, Rubio bunk with Romney at N.H. retreat // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 4, 2015

Wolfeboro, New Hampshire (CNN)Truth or dare? Warring pillow forts? What does one do at a presidential candidate slumber party?

We'll likely never know exactly what happened Friday at Mitt Romney's lakeside summer home in Wolfeboro, New Hampshire, where Chris Christie and Marco Rubio spent the night.

But Romney shared a few details Saturday morning at the Wolfeboro Fourth of July parade, saying he didn't give either candidates any advice on running.

"These guys will make their own mistakes, Romney said. "Hopefully, they won't follow mine."

The men ate hamburgers, hot dogs, baked beans, corn and potato salad, Romney added.

"It was great, they're great hosts," Rubio said Saturday.

So what did they talk about?

"Life. All kinds of stuff," Rubio said, adding, "No politics."

According to Romney and his wife Ann, the group stayed up late chatting.

"A lot of sports talk actually, and family, talked about our family and how we gather up here and what we do when we're up here. It was a lot of fun. We stayed up late last night," he said.

Romney's extensive experience as a presidential candidate -- as well as his broad network of donors -- makes him a unique resource for candidates competing for votes in New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

He said its exciting to watch the candidates this time around and even weighed in on the Democrats running.

"I thought it was going to be kind of boring, but I think Bernie Sanders has made it kind of exciting," Romney said.

On Friday, Christie praised the former Massachusetts governor.

"What matters most to me is that he's a resource for me," said the New Jersey governor, who was an early backer of Romney's 2012 candidacy. "And he's a resource for our party, someone who has been doing this process twice. He's been our nominee. That's somebody who you want to talk to and listen to, if you're someone who's running for the first time, like I am."

Christie, who is finishing up a five-day visit to New Hampshire, said it's too soon to expect an endorsement from Romney. For his part, Romney on Saturday said he's not going to endorse anybody until later in the nomination process.

"A lot of these folks helped me during my campaign. I'm going to be as loyal to them as they were to me," he said.

But Rubio and Christie are not the only two GOP candidates to sit down with Romney. On Monday, he'll meet with Jeb Bush and his wife, Columba, at Walker's Point, the Bush family home in Maine.

ObamaCare win turns up heat on GOP presidential field // The Hill // Peter Sullivan and Sarah Ferris – July 4, 2015

ObamaCare's victory at the Supreme Court is putting new pressure on Republican presidential candidates to map out a replacement to the healthcare law — a task that has eluded the party for more than five years.

With President Obama’s law twice affirmed by the nation’s high court, congressional Republicans now say a victory in 2016 is their best chance to tear down the statute and replace it with a GOP-favored alternative.

“I definitely think there will be pressure on these guys to put something out there,” said Lanhee Chen, the policy director for Mitt Romney’s 2012 presidential campaign. “They will need to have a plan.”

However, few of the party’s dozen 2016 hopefuls have thus far offered concrete details about what their alternative to the law would look like.
Chen said Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) are “arguably further along,” in their planning, a point echoed by other experts.

Rubio’s plan includes giving tax credits to people to help them afford coverage and setting up high-risk insurance pools for people with pre-existing conditions. His plan is still in the form of an op-ed, and has not been fleshed out with details like the size of the credits and how it would be paid for.

Jindal’s plan — outlined last year in a 23-page document — centers on providing $100 billion over ten years in block grants to states that come up with their own innovative healthcare proposals.

That funding would also be based on how well states control costs like premiums and how well they ensure access to high-risk individuals, such as people with pre-existing conditions.

Jindal’s and Rubio’s plans are more developed than much of the rest of the field. Jeb Bush’s campaign referred The Hill to a blog post posted this week on Medium, which includes a half-dozen bullet points about a system to “empower states” but offers no specifics. He proposed a form of “tax relief” for premiums and a “conservative solution” for people with pre-existing conditions.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, another one of the party’s frontrunners, has also been mum on details, and his campaign did not respond to a request for comment on his replacement plan.

Asked on Fox News last week about his replacement plan, Walker mentioned letting the market “drive things,” giving consumers “full information” about their choices and allowing people to buy insurance across state lines.

The campaign of Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) also did not respond to a request for comment. When asked how he would replace the law in January, Paul indicated he would largely return to the pre-ObamaCare system.

“Nobody's talking about a time when the government doesn't participate at all,” he said. “Even before ObamaCare, the government did take care of the bottom five or ten percent of our public, who were on Medicaid, and then there was also charity, so there are different ways that we take care and help the poor. Nobody's saying we wouldn't still do those things if we didn't have ObamaCare.”

A problem for Republicans is that ObamaCare’s coverage expansion gets more ingrained with each passing year.

Tom Miller, who advised Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on healthcare during his 2008 campaign, said he doesn’t expect any of the candidates to put forward a fully fleshed plan — because they don’t need to.

A promise to repeal ObamaCare remains a litmus test for the GOP, but Miller said it doesn’t mean that a Republican president would make it the first goal of their presidency.

The most likely scenario for a GOP president is a gradual phasing out of ObamaCare mandates, with help from Congress, to avert the chaos that would result from an immediate and complete repeal of the law, he said.

“You’re steering the ship in a different direction but it’s not going in a 180 degree change,” said Miller, a fellow at the conservative American Enterprise Institute. “No matter who is elected, it’s going to be slower and little bit more incremental.”

Even so, any Republican president would need to act quickly, he warned. By the time the next president takes office, the law will have been in place for nearly seven years.

“You run out of time. Every year into the future makes it harder to go into a different direction," Miller said, adding that he hasn’t yet endorsed a candidate.

The difficulty in drafting a replacement plan for ObamaCare became clear over the last six months as congressional Republicans scrambled to come up with contingency plans for the King v. Burwell ruling.

Like that decision, a full repeal of ObamaCare would cause millions of people to, at least temporarily, lose their subsidies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chen, the former Romney advisor, said that candidates have “guideposts” from two replacement plans, one from Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.) and one from Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.), Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) and Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). Both plans offer a form of tax credits, as ObamaCare does, but without the law’s mandate to buy coverage and same rules on pre-existing conditions and what a plan must cover.

After ObamaCare survived its last major legal challenge last week, Republicans acknowledge that full repeal is impossible with the president still in office.

Congress still has a few options to try to peel back pieces of the law — primarily, a legislative tool known as reconciliation that allows certain budget bills to bypass the Senate’s 60-vote threshold. Others are hoping to slash the president’s healthcare budgets through appropriation bills that make the law tougher to implement. But Obama wields the veto pen.

Several Republican presidential candidates in the last few weeks have said they are in favor of abolishing the Senate’s filibuster, which would help a Republican president repeal ObamaCare even if the party can’t reach 60 votes in the chamber.

That idea, though, has drawn opposition from one of the biggest ObamaCare critics in the 2016 field, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas).

Walker, along with former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former Hewlett Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, have all endorsed the idea, while Bush said he would “certainly consider” it during an appearance on the Hugh Hewitt show.

Still, there’s near universal consensus that the debate over full repeal will have to take place in the presidential debates.

“In 2016, we need to show the country what exactly we’d replace this law with,” House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said on CBS's "Face the Nation" after the ruling. “So that when we win the election in 2016, we have the ability to do it in 2017.”

The GOP’s pathetic crybaby agenda: Trump, Scalia and the whiny, paranoid new face of the right // Salon // Bill Curry – July 5, 2015

Republicans have no agenda. America won't fall for culture/religion wars anymore. Petulance is all they have left

We are numbed by Charleston; by its irrefutable proof of our still virulent racism and violent, gun-crazed culture, by being made to stare once again into the face of evil. Yet when the families of the slain stood up in court to voice forgiveness of Dylann Roof, we were startled and suddenly it was harder to divide us. Our politics is small to begin with; next to such staggering grief, it seems smaller still.

Like everyone on Facebook, Roof told us his life story in pictures. Absent the shots of him sporting the insignia of the Confederacy, apartheid and Nazi Germany, it’s hard to conceive of the Confederate flag being banished from Wal-Mart, let alone the ground of his state Capitol. Some may fly it out of mere nostalgia, but its core messages, now as always, are racism and sedition. It’s the flag of those who loved slavery more than their country; who sent hundreds of thousands to die rather than let one slave go free. A hundred and fifty years after Appomattox it is at last coming down. Long indeed is the arc of the moral universe.

The victory is more than symbolic. Fifty years ago as part of their post-Civil Rights Act national membership drive, Republicans began beaming coded racial messages to white voters. That code just got easier to crack. Fifteen years ago they began to amp up voter suppression under cover of absurdly inflated claims of voter fraud. If challenged on their motives or their facts they hurl furious denials. They can hurl all they want now. Debate has shifted. We’ve seen the pictures.

The slaughter of the Emanuel innocents was the most savage in a line of white-on-black slayings that pricked the nation’s conscience. The list of martyrs is long: Trayvon Martin, Michael Brown, Freddie Gray, Eric Garner, Walter Scott and countless others, known and unknown. Their deaths, though tragic, were not in vain. America is at last sifting through the evidence. A decade ago, most whites rejected every claim of racial disparity in our law enforcement and criminal justice systems. Now sentencing reform and cameras on cops are popular policies amongst all voters. We’ve a long ways to go, but there’s less doubt about where we’re headed.

President Obama has spoken eloquently of the millions of young black men in crisis in America. The chilling saga of Dylann Roof reminds us that millions of young white men are also in crisis. We can’t pretend to know its full nature or all its complex causes. We do know that, like young black men, young white men need better education and better jobs, better mental health services and better parenting. It’s probably time for someone to talk to them and their families as Obama spoke of and to young black men. For sure, it’s time we stop talking to them the way we do.

The right has long charged liberalism with fostering alienation, dependency, isolation and addiction among the poor — and leading minorities to reject traditional values and to see themselves as victims and whites as culprits. Now consider Dylann Roof: a jobless, stoned, opiate-abusing high school dropout who rejects such traditional values as law, order, hard work, sobriety and tolerance to vent his rage and blames his problems on a racially denominated 'other.'

The right blames all social pathologies on the left but would howl were anyone to imply that it helped spawn Dylann Roof — or that its anti-intellectualism led any young man to forgo college or that its economic policies left anyone without the chance for a decent job at decent pay. How does a young man so ensnared rationalize his fate? Roof got many of his theories from the website of the Concerned Citizens Council—"We oppose all efforts to mix the races"—headed by the lovely and vivacious Earl P. Holt III ("Black people are the laziest, stupidest, most criminally inclined race in the history of the world"). He was a donor to at least five current or former GOP presidential candidates. But the problem isn't confined to the dark demimonde of far right hate groups.

Young white males are dropping out of college, high school and the workforce in droves. In the reddest of states many turn to crime and drugs. They deserve better than a steady diet of racially coded conspiracy theories; better than Rick Santorum calling college a liberal trap or Mike Huckabee calling their centrist black president a "tyrant"; better than being taught each day to despise those who think different thoughts or blame those who don't look enough like them. The toxicity of right-wing politics seeps steadily into the larger culture. It runs on infantile rage and so must infantilize white men. We must find a way to reach even the ones who seem a danger only to themselves.

Some Republicans must feel shame, or at least sense risk. Late last month was full of historic happenings and at every one Republicans seemed out of sync or ill at ease. On Wednesday the Senate sent Obama the bill authorizing fast track approval for the Trans Pacific Partnership. It was a big win for them and a bigger one for him. Passage pleased both parties' big donors, who are after all the same people, more or less.

Some say the fight left Obama with wounds to heal but many of the wounded were Democrats in Congress, a group whose health he seldom asks after. Labor was mad but no one recalls the last time a union went off the reservation. Democratic voters tend to dislike trade deals, but if Obama's happy they're happy.

GOP voters really hate fast track, so House Republicans didn't take any victory laps. Passing the bill meant breaking their sacred vow not to let Obama do anything. His continued low standing would help them in 2016. But business wanted the bill and they figured Obama's last months in office would offer him few chances to gild his resume.

Wouldn't you know a big one got dropped in his lap the very next day? By a 6-3 vote the Supreme Court again upheld the Affordable Care Act. The TPP was a big win for Obama but this was huge. When the case was filed, few took it seriously. When the Court took it up, opinion shifted. Why would it go to the trouble of yet another review if five justices weren't at least thinking of voting for the plaintiffs?

The case came down to four words. Under the law the federal government may subsidize consumers buying insurance through exchanges "established by the states." But only 13 states set up exchanges. The rest use the federal exchange. The IRS ruled that Congress meant to provide subsidies to those purchasing via the federal exchange. The Court ruled that the IRS ruled correctly.

In a rude dissent, Justice Scalia called Justice Roberts' majority opinion "quite absurd… interpretive jiggery-pokery" that undermined the Court's reputation for "honest jurisprudence." The right exploded. Among GOP presidential candidates, Mike Huckabee outdid even Scalia, calling Roberts' ruling, you guessed it, "an act of judicial tyranny."

Only men as frivolous as Alito, Thomas and Scalia could fail to see it truly was a frivolous case. As loud as Scalia screamed that those four words could mean just one thing, Roberts was right to rule that the act's 381,113 other words meant just the opposite. Courts give agencies wide berths to interpret statutes but as Roberts took care to emphasize, here it didn't need to. Congress' intent was clear.

John Boehner vowed another repeal vote—it would be the 57th— but voters want to fix the law, not kill it. Republicans keep promising an alternative plan, but in the narrow confines of their ideology there is none. Obamacare, nee Romneycare, started at the Heritage Foundation. Heritage now denies paternity but when Romneycare was signed into law, its president attended the christening. GOP dead-enders are alone now on health care. In the TPP fight their donors stood at their side, but here the insurers, hospitals and docs are all with Obama.

On Friday the Court dropped the other shoe, voting 5-4 to recognize the right of all same sex couples to marry. The Republican response to Justice Kennedy's heartfelt opinion was predictable enough. Scott Walker said he'd amend the Constitution. Huckabee called it tyranny. Ted Cruz, sounding increasingly unhinged, preached nullification, if not outright sedition. But Jeb Bush and even Ben Carson said it was time to move on. They knew they were on the wrong side of not just history but demography, a bad place to be with an election coming on.

Watching Friday's joyous celebration in front of the Court, it was hard to imagine anyone not wanting to join in. For decades Republicans fought same-sex marriage on religious grounds. Watching those revelers I felt as I did hearing the families who forgave Dylann Roof — glad to bear witness to such a powerful expression of love. I wanted to be there and wondered if any Republicans wished they were, too.

Later that day Obama flew to South Carolina to deliver a eulogy for the Rev. Clementa Pinckney of Charleston's AME church. For six years even some of his staunch supporters had wanted him to address issues of race more forcefully and directly. On Friday he did all they'd asked and more. That he did it in Pinckney's honor — and in his church — made his words more powerful still. Early on, he evoked the history of all black churches,

…'hush harbors' where slaves could worship in safety… rest stops for the weary on the Underground Railroad; bunkers for the foot soldiers of the Civil Rights Movement.

He then called the shootings what they were, "not random, but … a means of control, a way to terrorize and oppress." He cited a policy or two — gun safety, voting rights — but mostly he preached about prejudice, duty, grace, forgiveness and love. The camera often cut to Boehner. who couldn't help looking out of place. Asked once on "Meet the Press" if he believed Obama was a Christian, Boehner replied tartly, "I take him at his word." Meaning, of course, that he didn't. Hearing Obama preach the word, I wondered what Boehner had to say now.

It was a historic week, though to pilfer a thought from Justice Kennedy, perhaps in ways we don't yet see. Kennedy's and Roberts' opinions will mean more or less depending on who our next president is. The Charleston tragedy changed us all, but in ways that will be hard to measure and impossible to prove. What seems most certain is that our politics is changing, perhaps even in a fundamental way.

Little more than a week ago the press portrayed Obama as reeling from a minor dust-up with House Dems over trade. Today he bestrides the town like a colossus. Politics is a tough game; he may be back on the skids shortly. But what happened to Republicans this week feels more lasting. Less than a year after their triumph in the 2014 midterms they seem suddenly to be in more than just cyclical trouble. There are, I think, three reasons for it.

The first reason is that the culture wars that have raged since the 1960s are at last winding down, at least as we've known them. Such historic changes don't happen overnight, but the week showed America at or near at or near a tipping point. Race ignited these wars. Issues of gender and sexuality fueled them. America is taking a harder look at all who seek to foment or exploit racial anger or fear, even as it continues to be transformed on issues of sexual preference and identity. We don't need to prove Republican complicity in the culture wars. They deny ever stooping to such tactics. Fine; if so, they've nothing to worry about.

The second reason is that religion is—there's no better word for it—evolving. If the GOP can't keep pace it will pay a steep price; we all know what evolution does to those who fail to adapt. Its response to Pope Francis' masterfully composed encyclical on climate change is a case in point. Bobby Jindal, Rick Santorum, and Jeb Bush, heretofore three of the showiest Catholics in all of Christendom, told His Holiness quite bluntly to mind his own beeswax. It seems they don't see how a threat to the survival of our species has a moral dimension. They don't listen to scientists either so one wonders whose advice they do take. (Oh, right.)

It was strangest coming from Bush, whose strict Catholic faith compelled him to hand Terry Schiavo's body over to Congress for disposition. Since "Catholic" and "Reagan Democrat" are near synonyms, dissing the Pope should come with fallout, but Republicans don't see it. James Inhofe, the moron who brought a snowball to the Senate to prove global warming's a hoax–he also chairs the environment committee–went on a Family Research Council radio show to say Francis unwittingly fulfilled a dark biblical prophecy, which would, technically speaking, make him an instrument of Satan. The Holy Father will be here in September. Republicans underestimate how happy we'll all be to see him; it's another event they'll wish they could attend in good faith.

The third reason is the absolute dearth of anything remotely resembling a real GOP policy agenda, unless you count corporate tax cuts. It turns out they can't have one, partly because their base is so crazy and partly because they are. For six years Obama tried to sell them Mitt Romney's healthcare reform and George Bush's immigration reform. They couldn't even meet for coffee. More than once he tried to sell them one of their own fiscal policies, but when word got out Obama was for it, they no longer could be. Their defense hawks' favorite remedy is more tough talk. What's their alternative to a nuclear deal with Iran? Best possible answer: do nothing and hope the sanctions regime holds. Likeliest answer: leave it to Bibi.

For a while now we've known and they've known that time's running out on the politics of racism and sexism or as they call it, traditional values. What we learned last week is how fast the sand is running through that hour glass. With those cards harder to hide up their sleeve and with no agenda to peddle, Republicans wandered all week from press conference to press conference looking dazed and confused.

The smart ones felt the ground shift beneath their feet. It isn't just the tyrant Obama staring them down now on healthcare. It's a 6-3 majority of a Republican Supreme Court, their friends in the medical and insurance industries and a majority of voters. On discrimination they have to beat not just "the radical gay lobby" but another likely Supreme Court majority and an even bigger popular one. For 20 years they ridiculed Al Gore for reading, knowing and caring so much about our environment. They'll find Pope Francis a tougher target. As for race, at Rev. Pinckney's service we saw love's power to heal and unite. If they watched, they saw it too.

Last week made Republicans easier to see through. My favorite Republican is Donald Trump, who can't open his mouth without giving away the game. Trump used his campaign kickoff to deliver a rant so offensive to Mexicans it forced Univision to cancel its broadcast of his tasteless beauty pageant. To retaliate he banned Univision employees from his golf courses, a move sure to help GOP outreach. Then NBC pulled out of his pageants and kicked him off "Celebrity Apprentice." It'll be interesting to see how many relationships he can torch before he feels he's reaped enough publicity to declare victory and get back to the links.

Seeing their limp diversification plans so easily thwarted makes Republicans more desperate to rev up the base. They're always on the lookout for new ways to divide and conquer and lately they think they've found one. It's called xenophobia. If you want to know more about it you can visit the same websites Dylann Roof frequents or those of any far right European political party. As you may know, all are on the rise. Their métier is immigration but they traffic in every species of nativism.

Republicans paint with a somewhat broader brush but clearly their new culture war focuses on the foreign 'other'; a mix of ISIS and immigrants, of Putin, China and Iran; of anyone and everyone who is or can be made to look scary. The world's a scary enough place but they know how to make it feel even more so. That they do it so well is one reason why Obama's foreign policy grades lag behind all his other grades by eight or more points in polls.

With no viable or salable domestic policies to run on in 2016 Republicans will complement their xenophobic neoconservatism with rehashes of various schemes to cut taxes on the rich and slash spending for the old, the poor and the sick; that and a vicious assault on the Democratic presidential nominee. It's a strategy anyone can see coming, so defeating it should be no problem, right? Wrong. There are in fact two problems.

One is that Republicans always nominate their least crazy candidate. Every four years Democrats pray they'll pick a Pat Buchanan or Michelle Bachman, a Ted Cruz or Ben Carson, but they never do. We hope the far right will rise up and win it all but it turns out even Tea Partiers vote tactically. In the end the party always goes with a Dole, a Romney or a McCain. Even George Bush didn't look like a guy who'd bankrupt the nation or lie his way into a catastrophic war. Granted, in a huge 2016 field only two or three fit the bill of not seeming crazy, but they'll find a way to thread the needle. Anyway, Democrats have a bigger problem: themselves.

Hillary Clinton runs ahead of her field even as Bernie Sanders puts up impressive numbers; in the size of his crowds; in his small donors–200,000 of whom have already ponied up $8 million—and in state polls. Thus far it isn't enough to get old liberal lobbies to take a serious look. Everybody's read a poll that told them, as polls always do, not to rock the boat. The smart money's been wrong so often it's a wonder they still call it that, but labor and environmental leaders still think and talk like political consultants.

Democrats' resistance to open debate is jaw dropping. You'd think they'd have learned from their experience with Obama. When he disappointed them early on, they held their tongues. Looking back, do they still think their silence did him any favors? Most think their mute loyalty to Hillary is helping now, but it isn't. Her strategy is clear. Like Obama in 2008, she hopes to break big-dollar fundraising records while giving speeches laced with populist metaphors. On national security she'll run to Obama's right, where she thinks it safest for the country and herself. She's a liberal on social issues and for once it may help.

The two issues that matter most to voters are the twin slow motion collapses of our democracy and our middle class. On both Clinton will do as she always does: preach the glories of growth and technology while nodding to political reform. The TPP vote showed us once again that she, Obama and most elite Dems march in lockstep with global capital, which runs on corruption. It's the wrong strategy for her and us — but absent a real contest and an open debate, just try moving her off it.

It was an amazing week. America shed bigotry even while mourning its victims. We saw a glimpse of a possible new politics. The country and the Court said loud racism and homophobia are no longer traditional or Christian values. A Republican Party that trafficked in bigotry and looked suddenly cornered. Many of its most easily identified leaders—Scalia, Trump, Cruz, Huckabee, Walker, Santorum, the list goes on—acting like infants, gave the lie to the whole enterprise. Still picking fights with their chosen cast of villains– terrorists, immigrants, gays, liberals, Obama—they saw the list of their foes suddenly lengthen to include Walmart, Univision, NBC, the Pope, the Supreme Court, the Constitution, the union and the rule of law. It was the future itself and it was circling them like a shark.

Perhaps most unexpectedly, the week brought the coming elections into focus by exposing the choice toward which we drift: between GOP supply side economics and xenophobia and the Democrats' neoliberal economics, pay to play politics and social liberalism. There's no question which is the better choice, but neither one will save us. With our environment, our democracy and our middle class all at their tipping points, we need something better. The most amazing thing about this week was that it reminded us of how to get it. The heroes of Emanuel church and the same-sex marriage movement know. So did Frederick Douglass: "If there is no struggle there is no progress." We can choose progress, but never quietly.

Facing a Selfie Election, Presidential Hopefuls Grin and Bear It // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters and & Ashley Parker – July 4, 2015

"Press that white button! This right here," the former secretary of state instructed a technologically deficient fan in New Hampshire who was fumbling to work an iPhone camera. Her patience thinning, Hillary Rodham Clinton took matters into her own hands and jabbed the button herself. And with the sound of an electronic shutter snap, another selfie — the must-have political souvenir of 2016 — went up into the cloud for campaign posterity.

Who wants their babies kissed or their yard signs autographed anymore? This is the Selfie Election. And if you are running for president, you have no choice but to submit.

Candidates can now spend an hour — or sometimes two, as Senator Rand Paul did last month in New Hampshire — exhausting a line of eager selfie seekers. Others, like Senator Ted Cruz, have learned to add an extra 20 minutes at the beginning and end of events because so many people want pictures.

Jeb Bush has perfected a technique suited to his 6-foot-3 frame: For his shorter fans, he will take the picture with his own outstretched selfie stick of an arm. The sons of Gov. Scott Walker have watched their father take so many, they say he has significantly polished his shutterbug skills. Gov. Chris Christie's staff says he has taken "too many to count."

But as campaigns adjust to a new self-focused social media world, some are left wondering whether more meaningful voter-candidate interactions are suffering. When candidates oblige so many people, some requesting multiple takes to straighten that smile, square a double chin or get a pesky photo bomber out of the frame, are they losing the chance to clarify a policy position, listen to concerns or even just look a voter in the eye?

"It's self-serving, and the candidate is kind of screwed," said Craig Robinson, a former political director of the Iowa Republican Party.

"They just have to put up with it, because how do you decipher who is a fan and who wants to fill their profile with pictures of them with candidates?" said Mr. Robinson, now the editor of The Iowa Republican, a political publication.

Indeed, it is not always clear whether the people asking for photographs even like or plan to vote for the candidate they are posing with, or whether they just want a Facebook trophy to flaunt.

Not all candidates care to oblige.

"Please stop," wrote Ben Carson, the retired pediatric neurosurgeon and Republican presidential hopeful, in a recent opinion piece for The Washington Post that raised a jarring if somewhat hyperbolic concern: Selfies kill.

"Beyond the obvious narcissism of endlessly photographing oneself and blasting it over social networks for others to admire, selfies are dangerous," he went on, citing a few examples of how inattentive selfie snappers had met their demise. (Falling off a cliff in Portugal, for example.)

Former President Bill Clinton has complained that he is inundated with requests whenever he goes out in public. At an event last year with another former president, George W. Bush, Mr. Clinton observed that even eating out had become a challenge — to which Mr. Bush cracked, "At least they're still asking."

President Obama has had to draw the line before. "I want to warn in advance, I can't do a selfie with everybody," he told a crowd last month.

Few people embody the selfie craze like Maggie Fitzgerald, a lobbyist in Des Moines who has maneuvered her way into photos with politicians willing and unwilling. Her biggest gets: Donald J. Trump, Rick Perry and Gov. Bobby Jindal, whom she found eager and obliging, and Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Paul and Mr. Carson, who seemed much less enthusiastic.

"Sometimes they'll ask me, 'Don't you want a normal picture?' " Ms. Fitzgerald said in an interview. "No, I just want a selfie."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She is undecided in the race, but said she gained some insight into the candidates by their demeanor during selfies. “Most of them aren’t stiff about it,” Ms. Fitzgerald added. “Some of them might be. But they shouldn’t be president.”

Then there are those who see the selfie as just one more example of how people have become slaves to their devices at the expense of human interaction. Queen Elizabeth II has said she finds the trend disconcerting and indicated she misses eye contact with her subjects.

For security teams on the campaigns, all this close contact between candidates and strangers can be a challenge, but in some ways it is easier to monitor than a traditional rope line. That is because selfies keep people’s hands up where they can be seen.

Many campaigns say they are benefiting after posing for all those pictures. When shared on Facebook and Instagram, they can exponentially increase a candidate’s visibility, spreading an authentic memento that helps extend the chatter around a rally beyond those who attended.

“This is something that campaigns should embrace and be very happy with, because it’s just free advertising,” said Mr. Paul’s chief digital strategist, Vincent Harris.

The Paul campaign sees a branding opportunity. When people line up for photos, campaign aides often erect a backdrop with a “Rand” logo on it for people to pose in front of. These exercises have also resulted in a little horizon broadening for Mr. Paul, who picked up a new term on the trail: “Us-ie,” a selfie with multiple people.

The ubiquity of camera phones at campaign stops is forcing aides to become proficient in operating different brands. Rick Tyler, an aide to Mr. Cruz, said the staff member who usually traveled with the senator was now well versed in how to quickly snap pictures with a Samsung Galaxy versus an iPhone.

The demand for selfies has grown so much, he added, that even walking just a short distance from one event to another can be an ordeal.

“Our schedulers will say to me: ‘He’s just going 100 steps. Why would it take 20 minutes to get there?’ ” Mr. Tyler said. “Well, travel with us and you’ll see.”

Senator Lindsey Graham said he could probably benefit from losing 15 pounds to make his selfies a bit more flattering. But his attitude toward selfies is upbeat: Society, he said, is richer for the selfie.

“When we take selfies and chat, it’s the beauty of American democracy,” Mr. Graham said. “I don’t think Putin really does this,” he added, referring to President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia. “I don’t think he probably has to worry about selfies.”

Senator Marco Rubio will indulge people who want selfies. But he often travels with a professional photographer who takes photos of him with voters as an aide trails behind, handing out index cards listing a website where supporters can go to download their pictures.

The benefit? Not only does the photographer speed the process and produce higher-quality images, but voters are asked to provide personal information on Mr. Rubio’s website. Before they can view their photos, Rubio supporters have told the campaign their name, their home and email addresses, which issues matter most to them and if they are willing to volunteer.

Even voters who embrace the selfie culture can seem slightly conflicted. Just take Lincoln Boyd, 22, who sneaked up to the stage at a recent conservative gathering and captured a selfie with Mr. Rubio that quickly went viral.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Boyd said he would have preferred to “grill” Mr. Rubio, asking him, “Why weren’t you able to corral the Republicans to get behind immigration?” But, he added, “there’s a time and a place for that.”

And, Mr. Boyd explained, “we’re millennials, it’s the 21st century, and if I’m with the candidate and I can get a quick picture with him, I’m going to do that.”

Voters are shifting to Democrats, flashing a warning for Republicans // WaPo // Dan Balz - July 4, 2015

The Gallup organization reported its latest findings on party identification late last week, and the report contained good news for the Democrats and a flashing yellow for Republicans.

The Democrats “have regained an advantage” over the GOP in party affiliation, Gallup’s Jeffrey M. Jones wrote in an accompanying analysis. Republicans, he added, “have seemingly lost the momentum they had going into last fall's elections."

The current numbers don't mean Republicans can't win the White House in 2016. The Democrats' advantage is not as large as at other points in the past, for example. But the findings add to a series of data points that underscore the challenges ahead for a party trying to keep pace with a rapidly changing country.

The latest numbers essentially mark a reset that returns party affiliation to its modern historical norm. Democrats long have enjoyed the advantage over Republicans in Gallup's measures.

In those few periods when the GOP drew even or slightly ahead (after Republicans took control of Congress in 1994 or after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001), the party has been unable to hold that ground for long.

These have obviously been good weeks for President Obama and the Democrats. The Supreme Court's decisions rejecting another legal challenge to the Affordable Care Act and ruling that same-sex marriage is now legal around the country gave the Obama administration two significant victories that were at odds with Republican doctrine.

Obama's eulogy at the memorial service for the Rev. Clementa Pinckney, one of nine people slain last month after Bible study at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, S.C., was further evidence of a president determined to leverage the powers of his office to advance an agenda at odds with the policies and positions of the GOP.

Republicans in Congress have blocked his path to legislative success on many of Obama's pet issues: gun control, minimum wage, immigration reform and climate change among them. But the president's sharpened rhetoric on these and other issues signaled a renewal of the quadrennial battle for public opinion and electoral support.

Obama has repeated his attacks on the GOP as a party out of touch with the country, as a party of the past during a time of historic change. Hillary Rodham Clinton is echoing that same message about the Republicans as she campaigns for the Democratic nomination.

Democratic Party affiliation no doubt has benefited by a modest rise in Obama's approval ratings, which were weak through most of 2014 and have recovered somewhat this spring and summer. The stronger Obama's approval ratings next year, the more likely it is that the Democrats will retain the White House for a third consecutive term.

This isn't the first time Obama has enjoyed a confluence of good events and renewed energy, only to see it slip away. Such ebbs and flows have marked his presidency from the start and could pull him down from the high moment he is enjoying.

Clinton is widely popular among Democrats of all ideological stripes, even as she faces a challenge from the left for the nomination from Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). Still, she carries substantial baggage that could affect her prospects in a general election, if she is the party's nominee.

Republicans must hope that they nominate a presidential candidate who the public sees as sharing its values and who embodies the future direction of the country. For now, however, the contest for the nomination offers potholes and pitfalls.

"Although Obama and the Republican majority in Congress remain a major focus of the political news coverage, attention is increasingly turning to the 2016 presidential campaign," Jones's analysis notes. "Here Democrats may be benefiting from having a well-known and relatively popular front-running candidate in Hillary Clinton, which paints a contrast to the large, fractured and generally less well-known field of Republican presidential candidates."

The Republican field on paper is substantially better than it was four years ago. But at present, no one is capturing the interest or imagination of the voters.

The best known among the group is former Florida governor Jeb Bush. But his family name and resistance hobble him to another Bush presidency.

The other Republicans have barely registered, even among party faithful. Every one of the candidates has a personal story he or she thinks will turn him or her into a more compelling figure, but few voters are listening at this point. The seeming strength of the field has yet to return dividends to the party as a whole.

Nor have the candidates begun to engage one another. When they do, the party will be plunged into a debate about the future — of health care, of the environment, of same-sex marriage, of the economy. On some of these issues, the divisions risk playing into Obama's and Clinton's characterization of the Republicans being caught in the past.

Obamacare animates the Republican base but is a call for repeal a winning issue?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On same-sex marriage, should Republicans stand for a constitutional amendment to give states the power to decide the definition of marriage, as some GOP candidates advocate, or try to take the issue off the agenda?

On climate change, the challenge appears to be finding the right language and the right balance on policy. How will the candidates divide on this issue?

The Republicans running for president have choices to make as they attempt to position themselves and their party as being in touch with the aspirations of a majority of the voters.

The principles and values they stand for and the fights they decide to take on will determine their success. What they have lost in affiliation over the past few months is not irretrievably gone, but having to make up lost ground is hardly the way Republicans wanted to start the 2016 campaign.

Presidential candidates campaign in July Fourth parades // AP // Kathleen Ronayne – July 4, 2015

AMHERST, N.H. — Alongside the patriotic music and waving flags Saturday in parades across Iowa and New Hampshire were clear reminders of a presidential race coming up next year: Red balloons promoting "Jeb! 2016," a tractor draped in a Rick Perry banner and dutiful volunteers holding signs and chanting for their chosen candidates.

Marching in Fourth of July parades in these early voting states has become a tradition for politicians seeking the White House, giving them a chance to boost their name recognition and glad-hand with voters.

Former Govs. Jeb Bush of Florida, Rick Perry of Texas and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island as well as South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham worked the crowd in Amherst, while Hillary Rodham Clinton marched in a parade in New Hampshire's North Country. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio spent the holiday in New Hampshire's Lakes Region, as Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley met voters in Iowa.

Clinton marched in a Fourth of July parade in Gorham, New Hampshire, trailed by a band of supporters waving signs and separated by a long rope from the pack of journalists that followed.

"I'll tell you what — we need to get a Democratic president," Clinton told one woman along the parade route, who asked about the health care overhaul. "I'm going to not only defend it, I'm going to make it even better."

One man who carried a sign that read, "Benghazi" also followed the candidate. Alluding to her time representing New York in the Senate, he screamed repeatedly, "Carpetbagger!"

Another man on the route yelled, "What about Benghazi? What about the emails?"

Clinton smiled broadly, shaking hands and stopping for quick photos. At one point, she posed for a photo with two New Hampshire beauty pageant contestants, who playfully flexed their biceps.

Graham and Perry brought the energy to Amherst, running through the streets waving, shouting jokes and posing for photos.

"Sorry the government's so screwed up!" Graham shouted to the crowd numerous times, often followed by an apology to any children in the crowd about the future of Social Security.

The former governor and current senator shook hands in the street, prompting jokes of a Perry-Graham presidential ticket. Later, Perry snapped a cell phone picture of Graham with two voters outside their home.

Chafee, meanwhile, walked the route with just a few aides and no large signs bearing his name — nothing to indicate he's vying for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Bush took a more methodical approach, shaking so many hands that his team had to nearly run down an entire street to catch up with the procession. His campaign handed out red "Jeb! 2016" balloons along the entire parade route.

"There's nothing behind us — other than Hillary," Bush joked to a voter who chided him for holding up the parade. While Clinton campaigned elsewhere, a team of her supporters marched right behind Bush's, their blue signs in sharp contrast with his red.

With his son George P. Bush, Texas's land commissioner, by his side, Bush picked up a number of small children, posed for selfies and thanked voters who said they've been longtime fans of the Bushs. One of those voters wore a shirt that said "Bush Hat Trick."

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal said he got clear instructions on how to behave in an Iowa parade — no throwing things to the crowd.

Jindal walked in a July Fourth parade in the Des Moines suburb of Urbandale. Accompanied by his wife, Jindal was the only Republican presidential candidate there, though other contenders had representatives there.

Jindal said he was cautioned that Iowa and Louisiana parades are different.

"We're used to throwing things in Louisiana parades. We're told that's not allowed here," he said.

Jindal said that one of the first time the family went to Disney World, the children were upset because Mickey Mouse didn't throw them anything.

"In Louisiana every single parade, not just Mardi Gras, you're supposed to throw things," the governor said.

Jindal kicked off the parade shaking hands and posing for selfies. He was scheduled to appear at another parade in the area later in the day. He has been campaigning in the kickoff caucus state since Tuesday.

Presidential hopefuls discuss patriotism on July 4th // Des Moines Register – July 4, 2015

Contenders for the nation's highest office are once again crisscrossing Iowa, the state that kicks off presidential voting. Often, they speak of their love of country.

In honor of this Fourth of July weekend, The Des Moines Register asked each of them: How in your life have you best demonstrated patriotism?

DEMOCRATS

Lincoln Chafee

Former governor and U.S. senator from Rhode Island

"Patriots are those who love their country. We have a country that is special — God shed its grace on thee, from sea to shining sea. I have spent three decades in public service because I want to do my small part to keep America strong and beautiful. I am proud of my record on protecting our water, air and land, on defending our constitutional liberties, on voting against the Iraq war, and on supporting programs that help build the middle class. We are fortunate to be Americans. Happy July Fourth!"

Hillary Clinton

Former U.S. secretary of state, former U.S. senator from New York

"I have never felt more patriotic than standing with our first responders in the aftermath of 9/11. The thick smoke made it hard to breathe or see, but the brave rescuers never wavered. They made me so proud to be an American, and inspired me to do everything I could as their senator to support them and rebuild. Tragically, many of our first responders suffered lasting health effects from their service at Ground Zero, and I spent years working with both parties until they got care. They represent America at its best, and they deserve the best from us."

Martin O'Malley

Former governor of Maryland

"We demonstrate patriotism through the care and compassion we show to one another as Americans. In my life, that has taken on the form of service to others — especially the most vulnerable and voiceless among us: the poor, the sick, the homeless, the hungry and the imprisoned. That service has also called me to be present, again and again, when our most courageous and patriotic families have lost a family member who died serving the rest of us."

Jim Webb

Former U.S. senator from Virginia

Editor's note: Webb was a combat Marine in Vietnam, awarded the Navy Cross, the Silver Star Medal, two Bronze Star Medals and two Purple Hearts; an assistant secretary of defense; and the secretary of the Navy. His campaign submitted this seal for his response:

REPUBLICANS

Jeb Bush

Former governor of Florida

"The Fourth of July is the perfect time to not only celebrate our independence but to reflect on and thank those defending our freedom today. As governor of Florida, I had the honor of serving as commander in chief of the Florida National Guard. Daily, I was inspired by patriotism and sacrifice of our men and women in uniform. Whether serving overseas in war or responding to the eight hurricanes that battered the Sunshine State in just 16 months, Florida's national guardsmen exemplified the values of all the men and women who have committed to serving in our armed forces."

Ben Carson

Retired neurosurgeon

"I am humbled before God and before the courage and leadership of our Founding Fathers. These are the touchstones and the guiding light of my faith and patriotic values. Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Nathan Hale; they represent the very essence of patriotism, defined by their selfless duty and service to their countrymen, and the generations that have followed. Long ago, I accepted their baton of service to my fellow man as my calling in life, as a care provider for children and as an advocate for the principles of our Constitution."

Chris Christie

Governor of New Jersey

"The brave men and women who have worn our nation's uniform have courageously and selflessly served to uphold the democratic principles that as Americans we hold so dear. At the same time, we must remember the families of those who made the ultimate sacrifice and did not come home. I am honored to be governor of a state with so many heroic and honorable men and women who have served with distinction. We are forever grateful for their service, today and every day."

Ted Cruz

U.S. senator from Texas

"My father came to America from Cuba in 1957. He had little money, and spoke little English. My Irish-Italian mother was the daughter of working-class parents. Both my parents worked hard. In a single generation, their son became a United States senator, and now I am running for president. That could only happen in America. These stories demonstrate how America is the land of limitless opportunity. I ask myself, 'What have I done today to ensure that same opportunity exists for future generations?' We're an exceptional nation, and it is up to each of us to keep it that way."

Carly Fiorina

Former CEO of Hewlett-Packard

"Ours was intended to be a citizen government, so when citizens volunteer our time and talent to make our country, our government and our politics better, we exhibit patriotism. I have continued to make this a priority, acting as a volunteer chair of two large charities dedicated to improving our communities. I have volunteered my time to help good candidates run for political office — and I have even volunteered more directly to improve our government, serving as an adviser for the departments of State, Defense and Homeland Security as well as for the CIA and (National Security Agency)."

Lindsey Graham

U.S. senator from South Carolina

"I was honored to be an Air Force officer serving on active duty, in the Guard, and in the Reserves for 33 years. Being part of a military unit that is focused on the mission and not on individual differences was a great inspiration and taught me what true patriotism is all about."

Mike Huckabee

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former governor of Arkansas

"When I was asked how I demonstrate patriotism, I considered all the ways I try to convey my love and gratitude for this truly exceptional nation, where a poor kid from Arkansas can someday become governor. But then I remembered JFK: 'Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country.' And I realized that what perfectly demonstrates pure, selfless patriotism are those who love this country so much they offer their lives to preserve its freedoms and opportunities for us all: the heroic men and women of the United States military. "

Bobby Jindal

Governor of Louisiana

"My parents came to chase the American dream and they caught it, they've lived it. I simply want my children and one day my grandchildren to be able to live that same American dream. I want all of our children to have those opportunities, so I'm incredibly grateful for the opportunities that America has afforded my family. I want those opportunities to continue. One of the ways I can show my gratitude for what this country has done for me is fight with everything I've got to make sure those opportunities continue to exist for the next generation."

John Kasich

Governor of Ohio

"Patriotism means you don't take a pass on dealing with problems where you live. Far too many officials fear taking on big challenges, and as a result, nothing gets done and problems worsen. Throughout my public career both in Congress and as governor, I have taken on the challenges of the day in the belief that big ideas drive success and generate excitement. Are they risky? Do they aggravate some people? Sometimes. But, if you're not doing that, you're not doing your job, and a strong agenda of ideas is not only what people want — it's what our nation needs."

Rick Perry

Former governor of Texas

"Patriots put their country first, alongside faith and family. I had the honor of wearing America's uniform, defending freedom as an Air Force officer and aircraft commander. I inherited my love and sense of duty for my country from my father, a WWII B-17 tail gunner. Patriots work 365 days a year, not just on July 4. Providing for our heroes and their families is a sacred duty I take extreme pride in executing. As governor, we took important steps to expand our commitment to our nation's heroes. As commander in chief, it would remain one of my highest priorities."

Marco Rubio

U.S. senator from Florida

"One way I exercise patriotism is by teaching my kids what America means to me on a personal level. In school and from our entertainment culture, children rarely receive a meaningful explanation of the principles and ideals that set America apart from every other nation. I teach my children that they, like me, owe a debt to America, for it is the nation that changed our family's history. I believe these conversations are important, for if our children believe America is just an ordinary country, they will not be willing to go to extraordinary lengths to extend her promise."

Rand Paul

U.S. senator from Kentucky

"To me, patriotism means giving back to your community. Whether it is volunteering at the local food shelter, tutoring struggling students, singing in the church choir, or the most selfless act of all, serving in our military to protect our nation and our American values. As a physician, I have an obligation to help those in need. I am honored to have the opportunity to perform free sight-restoring eye surgeries for lower-income families in my home state. There is nothing more rewarding than using my skills as an ophthalmologist to give back — to find the problem and diagnose the solution."

Rick Santorum

Former U.S. senator from Pennsylvania

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The moment in my life I gave the most for my country was not when I ran for Congress, not when I ran for the Senate, and not when I decided to run for president. The moment I most committed myself to my country was the day my son Daniel came to me and said he wanted to join the Air Force. I cannot give more to my country than one of my own."

Donald Trump

Businessman

"Our country has a sacred duty to care for veterans and their families. One of the greatest gifts of my success is being able to honor veterans. I sit on the board of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund, which helps find jobs for veterans. One of my proudest accomplishments: In 1995, on the 50th anniversary of World War II, only 100 spectators watched New York City's parade. It was an insult. I agreed to lead a second parade that year. I made a $1 million matching donation to finance the parade. Over 1.4 million watched; more than 25,000 veterans participated."

Scott Walker

Governor of Wisconsin

"My family lived in Plainfield, Iowa, from 1970 to 1977. Right around the time of our nation's bicentennial, I noticed that there was no state flag at our City Hall. That inspired me and my brother to go around town with an old mayonnaise jar and collect enough money to purchase an Iowa flag to fly at City Hall. My mom still has a picture of my brother David and me holding the flag, with smiles on our faces."

Editor's note: Campaigns for George Pataki and Bernie Sanders either declined to provide a statement or did not respond to requests to do so. Candidates were asked to submit statements of 100 words or fewer. Longer responses were edited to that length.

Candidates do holiday march through New Hampshire // USA Today // David Jackson – July 4, 2015

AMHERST, N.H. — Ah, the Fourth of July in New Hampshire: parades, picnics, pyrotechnics and — and every four years — presidential candidates.

Republicans and Democrats marched up and down New Hampshire on Saturday's holiday, seeking to build support and goodwill seven months before the Granite State holds the first presidential primaries of the 2016 campaign.

"It's great to be in New Hampshire!" former Florida governor Jeb Bush told a crowd in Amherst, N.H., at its traditional July 4 parade.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry and South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, both Republicans, also marched in Amherst.

Other campaigns, Democratic as well as Republican, sponsored marchers in the parade that began at an elementary school staging area and wound its way to a village green filled with families, musicians and games of chance.

As is tradition, the candidates walked at the back of the parade, behind exhibits that included a truck carrying a Pop Warner football team, Shriners in tiny red Corvettes, Civil War re-enactors dressed in Union blue, high school bands, a kayak club, a clown car, at least one small horse-drawn carriage and bagpipers blaring Amazing Grace and other tunes.

Graham noted to supporters that he was at least first in the parade line among the politicians.

"This is a good omen," he said. "It means everybody else should drop out, except me."

At one point on the parade route, Bush — the son of one president and the brother of another — walked up to a man wearing a red T-shirt that said: "Bush Hat Trick."

"I told you it'd work," the man told family and friends as the candidate seeking to be the third Bush president strode up.

"Where'd you get that shirt?" Bush said as photographers and supporters converged.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush later marched in another parade in nearby Merrimack.

Throughout the parade in Amherst, the candidates shook hands, held babies, posed for selfies and signed campaign placards. At one point, Bush signed the cast of a woman who had injured her leg playing soccer. The two discussed Sunday's U.S.-Japan Women's World Cup final, each predicting an American victory.

Two other Republican candidates — Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie — walked in the traditional parade in Wolfeboro, N.H. Both Rubio and Christie spent time this weekend at the nearby home of Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican presidential nominee.

Democratic presidential candidates also partook in July Fourth festivities in both New Hampshire and Iowa, where caucuses will be the first nomination contests of 2016.

Former secretary of State Hillary Clinton marched in a parade in Gorham, N.H., after a local visit to a Mountain Fire Pizza.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley spent the holiday in Iowa. Sanders, who is moving up in polls against the heavily favored Clinton, walked in parades in Creston and Waukee.

O'Malley, who has been in Iowa promoting his climate change plan, marched in the July Fourth parade in aptly named Independence, Iowa, before hitting the barbecue circuit in Dubuque and Clinton.

Another Democratic candidate, former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee, spent Saturday at the parades in Amherst and Merrimack, N.H.

Surveying the scene in Amherst, as residents hung bunting or positioned lawn chairs in front of white clapboard houses, Chafee said: "It's Americana, isn't it?"

Wirthman: Hillary Clinton's everyday feminism // The Denver Post // Lisa Wirthman – July 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign is a manifesto for everyday feminism, both in Colorado and the nation. And that's a good thing. It's long past time to air out our deep-seated gender issues and redefine what it means to be a woman.

For decades, women have tried to fit into a world standardized around men. In her 2008 presidential campaign, Clinton said she wasn't running as a woman, but as a great candidate. For 2016, she's wholeheartedly embraced the fact that she can be both.

Fueled by social media and a progressive cultural environment, feminism has never been more popular — or more populist. And that's a good thing, too.

The economy is stronger when more women are involved, not just a token few. This is not because women are inherently better than men, but because diversity of thought and experience is better than a narrow view.

Colorado is a top state for women's workforce participation, which overall added $2 trillion to the U.S. economy since the 1970s. Yet women hold only 7 percent of top corporate positions in Colorado.

In the 2016 presidential race, women are a majority of registered voters in Colorado, and a widening gender gap could tip the scales. Single white women — along with Hispanics, young voters, and working-class white men — are likely swing votes in the election.

Clinton launched her campaign in June with a reference to her historic candidacy, calling her outdoor rally on New York's Roosevelt Island "a place with absolutely no ceilings."

To break those glass ceilings, women in Clinton's generation often had to work twice as hard as their male colleagues to earn half as much money — all while dealing with rampant sexism.

While these glass breakers are celebrated for their firsts, however, they're also criticized by younger feminists for being the only members of a small and exclusive group.

In 2016, feminism's greatest challenge is that women must not only be equal to men, but to each other as well.

From the start, the banner of feminism has been held primarily by white women privileged with the education and opportunity to reach the glass ceiling — and make those initial cracks. But women's suffrage also has strong ties to social justice.

In Colorado, suffragists argued that female voters would address the needs of working people who were ignored by mainstream politicians, according to the Women of the West Museum.

Today, young women are quick to point out that so-called corporate feminists rarely represent the intersection of race, class, gender, and sexual orientation that creates a multilayered experience for many women.

The issue of equal pay, which Clinton referenced in her kick-off speech, is a good example of that intersection. While women in Colorado make 77.9 cents for every dollar earned by men, African- American women make 67.5 cents on that same dollar, and Hispanic women make just 52.5 cents.

If Clinton captures women's votes in 2016, it won't be simply because of her gender, but also because she convinces women of all backgrounds and experiences that she's willing and able to flip America's patriarchy on its head.

So far, she seems to understand the challenge. Clinton's "Fighter" campaign video highlights her 1995 visit to Beijing, where she told the U.N. Conference on Women: "Human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights, once and for all."

It was one of Clinton's most iconic feminist moments — and a part of her résumé that clearly illustrates her willingness to fight for all women and girls.

Clinton established herself as a fighter again in her kickoff speech, in which she outlined her plan to restore equity to the middle class.

And she's planted her feet firmly at the intersection of gender, class, race and sexual orientation in solidarity with women who see feminism as just one facet of a more complex identity.

Clinton is impassioned on racial issues. After the shooting of nine people in a black church in Charleston, S.C., she told the U.S. Conference of Mayors: "Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

She strongly supported the Supreme Court's decision to legalize gay marriage in all 50 states. "Love triumphed in the highest court in our land," Clinton told supporters. "Equality triumphed."

And she includes men in feminism's promise of equal opportunity by framing universal preschool and child care, paid sick days and family leave, and affordable college as family issues that impact both genders. It's a timely message: In Colorado, more than 60 percent of children under the age of 6 live in households where all parents work.

Of course, female leadership is no guarantee for passing family-friendly legislation. Colorado has the highest percent of female legislators of any state, and an all-female leadership team in the house.

But with Republicans controlling the state Senate, Democrats were unable to pass bills to create a family and medical leave insurance program, raise the minimum wage, or make it easier for middle-class families to save for college.

Clinton would face a similarly tough battle. But it's these populist elements of her campaign that may give her the chance to fight it.

Clinton's everyday feminism is also a contrast to the more individualized brand of feminism promoted by GOP candidate and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, who recently visited Colorado.

In a campaign speech, Fiorina said a feminist is "a woman who lives the life she chooses." Unfortunately, that definition only includes women who have the opportunity to make choices.

Eventually, the GOP's male candidates will need to join this conversation. And that's a good thing, too. Because while over 80 percent of Americans say they believe in full gender equality, only one-fifth identify themselves as feminists — or people who believe all men and women should have equal opportunities.

Back in 2007, Clinton's gender-neutral campaign created strong debate among feminists. "Do liberated women want to join the clubhouse or do we want to burn it down?" asked a columnist for The Nation.

The answer is neither. Feminism's goal is not to enable women to succeed in a man's world, nor to attack the success of men. Rather, it requires an entirely new paradigm, where success is no longer defined by male experiences, and all human beings have equal opportunities to succeed.

By putting her gender at center stage in 2016, Clinton may finally clarify the conversation — and help voters realize our shared belief in gender equality makes us all feminists at heart.

Editorial: Hillary Clinton's emails erode transparency claim // The Des Moines Register – July 4, 2015

A thistle to former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, who claimed in March that she had turned over to the State Department all relevant work emails from her private server, and that she had never used her private account to exchange classified information. Last week, the State Department acknowledged that Clinton didn't turn over at least 15 emails that are now the subject of controversy. It also said portions of 25 emails it was releasing are being kept confidential and "upgraded" to classified status. As a presidential candidate, Clinton is turning press avoidance into something of an art form, yet she once called herself "probably the most transparent person in public life." It's a claim that becomes less believable with each passing day.

Fair pay for hard work is not just happy talk // The Columbus Dispatch // E.J. Dionne – July 5, 2015

Central to our national self-understanding is the idea that hard work pays off. Americans have always tolerated rather high levels of inequality, as long as most people had a chance to rise.

Thus was Chris Christie's opening tribute to his hardworking parents and grandparents the most affecting part of his announcement on Tuesday that he is seeking the Republican presidential nomination. The New Jersey governor bestowed praise across gender lines, describing his grandmothers as women "who knew how to work and who knew that hard work would deliver something for their children."

This section of Christie's speech got little attention. But work, its rewards and its discontents, will be central to our nation's debate going into the 2016 campaign. And President Barack Obama has laid down a marker for testing how seriously politicians take the obligation to make hard work pay.

Obama is putting forward new rules that would make up to 5 million more American workers eligible for overtime pay. He's doing this by ending a scam through which employers designate even relatively low-paid workers as managers to get around the law, which requires an overtime premium after 40 hours per week.

Under the current rules, as Obama wrote earlier this week in the Huffington Post, workers earning as little as $23,660 a year can be robbed of overtime by being given supervisory or managerial designations. The new regulation would raise the threshold to a more-plausible $50,440 a year.

Not surprisingly, some firms immediately announced they would find ways of evading the rule, warning of shorter hours and fewer jobs. But there are always people in business — not everyone — who react this way to any effort to improve the bargaining position or compensation of employees. Remember all those warnings that the Affordable Care Act would be a "job killer"? Funny how we seem to have added well over 12 million new private-sector jobs since Obamacare passed in March 2010.

And avoiding overtime is not the only way in which employers are trying to cut the compensation they offer workers. This week, The Wall Street Journal's Lauren Weber reported on how businesses are "setting up workers as franchisees or owners of limited liability companies" to "shield" themselves "from tax and labor statutes." My Washington Post colleague Catherine Rampell also has documented "the shifting of risk off corporate balance sheets and onto the shoulders of individual Americans."

In discussing rising inequality, we often act as if the trend is a natural development about which we can do nothing. Of course there are big economic forces at work. But government rules and laws — on pay, health care, labor rights and taxes — can improve the standing of workers or they can make the disparities worse. Government has a choice, and there is no purely neutral ground on this question.

And this is why Christie's lovely tribute to work and family needs to be examined as something more than a sentiment from a greeting card. In the wake of the Supreme Court's ruling on same-sex marriage, what are typically referred to as "values issues" quickly rose to the forefront of the argument in the Republican presidential primary and next year's election. But no values issue is more relevant to more Americans (across the boundaries of sexual orientation, gender and race) than whether the hard work that politicians extol pays off in the ways they claim it should.

In a very crowded Republican presidential field, will any candidate find it in his or her interest to break with the party's orthodoxy on government regulations and labor rights? Will any of them have the temerity to appeal to their party's many working-class supporters by making the point that Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and other Democrats are sure to advance: that reinforcing our "conservative" values about the honor of work often requires what are usually seen as "progressive" measures by government to keep workers from being shortchanged?

“One of the things my mother used to say all the time,” Christie declared on Tuesday, “was, ‘Christopher, if you work hard enough, you can be anything.’” That is precisely the promise that our politicians should be working harder to vindicate.

Hillary Clinton takes the knocks but keeps on trucking // Sydney Morning Herald // Annabel Crabb – July 4, 2015

I cannot be the only carbon-based life form on Earth who fell a little bit in love with Hillary Clinton when it was revealed on Wednesday that she cannot use a fax machine.

And not in an adorable, Gen-Y, "what is a fax machine, old person with kind eyes?" way either. No, Hillary Clinton – a woman in her late sixties whose professional career has witnessed the fax machine's entire trajectory from infancy to ascendancy and thence to redundancy – cannot use a fax machine because they are just stupid and annoying and it's not her fault.

Clinton's refreshing fax-fail was revealed in the blizzard of her private emails released last week for reasons only trainspotters can now readily recall. Her exchange with aide Huma Abedin (a woman who - being married to serial social media willy-waver Anthony Wiener - has ample cause to distrust any image-based form of electronic communication) occurred in December 2009 and carries the subject line: "Can you hang up the fax line, they will call again and try fax".

HC: I thought it was supposed to be off hook to work?

HA: Yes but hang up one more time. So they can re-establish the line.

HC: I did.

HA: Just pick up phone and hang it up. And leave it hung up.

HC: I've done it twice now.

I like political leaders to be good at their jobs wherever possible, but that's not to say a tiny part of me doesn't rejoice when they fail at basic tasks. And the ancillary revelation that Mrs Clinton didn't know what the diplomatic "E3+3" grouping was, even when she was the senior US representative on it, also reassures me as to her fundamental humanity.

"What is the E and who are the three?" a mystified Clinton emailed her adviser Jake Sullivan in 2009.

JS: E is Europe. E3 is UK, France and Germany. +3 is US, China, Russia. So it's the same 6 as P5+1, just a different name.

HC: I already feel safer.

Hillary Clinton has been in and out of – or spousally proximate to – public office in America for thirty-six years now. And in that time, America has lived through a lot with that lady. It's praised her, despised her, turned its nose up at her 1993 health reforms, felt sorry for her when Bill went out tomcatting, harboured suspicions about her motivations, opted for the other guy in 2008, paid her out for her scrunchies and pantsuits, snoozed through her recent memoir, and next year Americans will all get together (or at least the 57 per cent of them who bother to vote will; the rest will heckle from the couch) to cast a final judgment on her.

This is a person who just keeps on trucking. Not much is handed to her. The mounting-yard of opponents to her presidential run grows both more populous and more ludicrous by the day; there are nearly 20 declared candidates now. On Thursday, New Jersey Republican Governor Chris Christie announced he too would be running. This is a guy best-known for intentionally causing large traffic jams for base political purposes, so the scale of his optimism here is fairly impressive; half of the Republican Party, it seems, thinks they have a shot against Mrs Clinton.

It's not that the bread always falls butter-side-down for the former First Lady; she has had a privileged life, and many opportunities, and people will pay her several hundred thousand dollars just to turn up and make a speech, which is more than you can say for most people who've missed out on big jobs or been cheated on by their husbands.

But it's interesting to consider what all the loudly-proclaimed recent triumphs of the Obama administration - the Supreme Court backing Obamacare and declaring gay marriage to be legal across the USA, Obama's congressional win on the Trans-Pacific Partnership free trade deal and so on – will mean for a campaigning Hillary Clinton.

Imagine the handover letter from the departing President Obama:

"Hi Hill! Couple of housekeeping things. You're welcome to everything in the garden. Don't hang around near any lighted White House windows at night. And sorry about the dog hair. On policy: I've done health care reform, and it seems to be sticking. (You're welcome!) I've introduced gay marriage, pretty much, so look out for angry religious types. Also gun owners, because I've promised we're going to do something about that stuff. I'm sure you'll do a super job of taking guns off people. Plus I've pledged some pretty stiff carbon emission cuts, which the Republicans hate. And I've legislated that free trade deal, which our party hates. You'll muddle through, I'm sure. Let's see, what else – oh yeah. I've opened an embassy in communist Cuba. Enjoy! And don't hesitate to fax me if you need anything. Barack."

Emotional decisions and Hillary Clinton's presidential bid (Your letters) // Syracuse // Max Malikow – July 4, 2015

To the Editor:

Separated by over two centuries, David Hume, a philosopher, and Jonathan Haidt, a psychologist, have said decision-making tends to be emotionally driven. Both have written of the human tendency to begin decision making with a conclusion derived from feelings followed by the intellectual work of justifying the conclusion. I'm not exempt from this proclivity, but I am aware of it and resist it.

Concerning the current presidential campaign and Hillary Clinton's candidacy, I submit there is nothing in her resume to support the belief that she is qualified to serve as president of the United States. An eight-year stint as first lady, an uneventful tenure as a senator, and accumulating frequent flier miles as secretary of state have not prepared her for the oval office. Moreover, being a woman is hardly a credential for the presidency.

In the 1960 presidential campaign John Kennedy addressed the possibility of being the first Catholic president: "I hope that no American, considering the really critical issues facing this country today, will waste his franchise and throw away his vote, by voting either for me or against me because of my religious affiliation. It is not relevant."

I doubt Mrs. Clinton will address her status as a woman seeking the presidency by saying, "It is not relevant." I also doubt what I've written here will have the slightest effect on anyone who is emotionally committed to Hillary Clinton - and there are many. So I brace myself for her nomination, election, and presidency.

Gay rights activists in Philadelphia mark landmark march from 1965 // WaPo // Natalie Pompilio – July 4, 2015

PHILADELPHIA — Gay rights activists gathered in front of Independence Hall in Philadelphia on the Fourth of July to mark the progress of their movement and pay tribute to those who launched it a half-century ago — but also made it clear that the fight for equality was far from over.

“In too many communities, you can still get married on Sunday and then fired on Monday. Marriage equality was a critical milestone but not the final destination,” said activist Aisha Moodie-Mills, referring to the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision legalizing same-sex marriages nationwide.

“If history has taught us anything, it’s that no community’s rights are one and done with a simple piece of legislation,” Moodie-Mills said. “Equality is not set in stone.”

The event was part of a weekend-long celebration of some of the earliest gay rights marches, including a gathering of about 40 protesters calling for equality at the same location on July 5, 1965.

Organizers called that demonstration an incredibly bold and courageous move by the standards of the day, when homosexuals were legally barred from government jobs and could be arrested for engaging in consensual intimate acts even in the privacy of their own homes. The American Psychiatric Association classified being gay as a disease that could be treated with chemical castration or lobotomy.

“Fifty years ago, America perceived us as degenerates,” said Malcolm Lazin, who organized the anniversary events. “One of the many goals of the gay pioneers was to demonstrate that we are first-class American citizens.”

One way they did that in 1965 was with a dress code for the picketers: suits for men, dresses and pantyhose for women. The marchers were silent, holding hand-lettered signs calling for fair treatment. During Saturday’s ceremony, a group of 40 people re-created that march, walking in a circle on the cobblestone street in front of the building where both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were signed.

The event also paid special tribute to the “mother and father of the gay rights movement,” as Lazin described them: activists Barbara Gittings and Frank Kameny.

Other notables included Edie Windsor, the plaintiff in the 2013 Supreme Court case that struck down parts of the Defense of Marriage Act; Judy and Dennis Shepard, whose son Matthew was killed in 1998 because of his sexual orientation; the Rev. Gene Robinson, the first openly gay priest in the Episcopal Church; and Walter Naegle, long-time partner of civil rights activist Bayard Rustin, a confidant of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Entertainer Wanda Sykes, who hosted the event, joked that she was now “a happily married woman in all 50 states, but I’m not sure I’m going to go test the water in all 50 states. I’ll let them get a little bit used to it first.”

Jim Obergefell, who was listed as the lead plaintiff in the successful lawsuit that led the Supreme Court to legalize same-sex marriage, was stopped after his remarks by South Jersey resident Jim Mancinelli, 64, and his partner of 15 years, Dave Helgeson, 52.

“Thank you so much. I really appreciate what you did for all of us, the strength you showed for all of us, the courage you showed for all of us,” Mancinelli said, gesturing between himself and Helgeson as his eyes filled with tears.

Obergefell, too, was emotional as he replied, “I loved my husband,” who died in 2013.

“It was the easiest thing in the world to do.”

Fatal shooting in San Francisco ignites immigration policy debate // LA Times // Louis Sahagun and Emily Alpert Reyes – July 4, 2015

San Francisco and its liberal policy toward people in the U.S. illegally were thrust into the national political debate this weekend after the fatal shooting of a woman at a popular tourist destination, allegedly by a man with a criminal record who had been deported to Mexico several times.

The Board of Supervisors adopted a law in 2013 that limited the conditions under which those arrested could be placed in federal immigration holds. Since then, dozens of cities and counties across the country have stopped complying with immigration "detainer" requests after a federal judge ruled that an Oregon county violated one woman's 4th Amendment rights by holding her for immigration authorities without probable cause.

The San Francisco law allows holds only for people with violent records. The suspect in the shooting, Francisco Sanchez, 45, had several felonies but no major violent crime conviction in recent years, according to the San Francisco Sheriff's Department.

On March 26, Sanchez was booked into the San Francisco County Jail on a 10-year-old drug-related warrant. The following day, local charges against Sanchez were dismissed in San Francisco County Superior Court. Despite his undocumented status, Sanchez was released from custody after the Sheriff's Department confirmed that he had no active warrants and had completed a federal prison sentence on separate charges, officials said.

San Francisco's ordinance made Sanchez ineligible for a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement hold because he did not have "a violent felony conviction within the last seven years, or a probable cause for holding issued by a magistrate or judge on a current violent felony," said Freya Horne, an attorney for the San Francisco Sheriff's Department. "Nothing in his background showed anything like that."

Sanchez was freed even though ICE sought to hold him for deportation, said Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman for the federal agency.

"An individual with a lengthy criminal history, who is now the suspect in a tragic murder case, was released onto the street rather than being turned over to ICE for deportation," Kice said. "We're not asking local cops to do our job. All we're asking is that they notify us when a serious foreign national criminal offender is being released to the street so we can arrange to take custody."

The San Francisco Sheriff's Department announced last year that it would only honor such requests if a judge had vetted them or a warrant was obtained.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

San Francisco County Sheriff Ross Mirkarimi said Kice misses the point. "ICE was informed about San Francisco's position on detainers," he said, "but did not seek a court order for Sanchez's transfer as required under the law."

"That's all they had to do," he said. "Get a court order and we'd be happy to honor it."

Sanchez was arrested Wednesday after police responded to reports of a shooting on Pier 14 near the Embarcadero and Mission Street. Police found Kathryn Steinle, 32, with a fatal gunshot wound to her upper body. After she fell to the ground, Steinle, who had recently moved to San Francisco, reportedly kept saying, "Dad, help me, help me."

She was transported to a local hospital, where she was pronounced dead.

The motive for the shooting remains under investigation, but police believe it was a random attack.

An hour later, working on tips provided by witnesses, authorities arrested Sanchez, who has seven felony convictions and has been deported five times, most recently in 2009, authorities said. Four of his convictions involved narcotics charges.

In 1989, San Francisco passed the "city and county of refuge" ordinance that barred city money from being used to enforce immigration law and prohibited authorities from stopping people based solely on their immigration status or country of origin. The city has since expanded its sanctuary policies.

The original ordinance grew out of the sanctuary movement of the 1980s, when churches across the country provided refuge to Central Americans fleeing civil strife in their homelands. Since then, hundreds of cities and counties across the country have adopted "sanctuary" laws or policies, most recently in response to immigration raids that have torn thousands of families apart.

Civil rights organizations argue that ICE's detention requests are unconstitutional under the 4th Amendment because they are not based on any finding of probable cause.

Angela Chan, senior staff attorney for Asian Americans Advancing Justice — Asian Law Caucus, pointed out that many law enforcement agencies, including the Los Angeles Police Department, decided to reexamine their practices after a 2014 federal ruling determined that an Oregon county was liable for damages after holding an inmate beyond her release date so she could be transferred to Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"Nationally, over 320 jurisdictions do not respond to ICE holds because they violate the 4th Amendment of the Constitution," Chan said. In San Francisco, "even if the sheriff had a policy of responding to ICE holds, if he'd respond he would be liable. He'd be sued."

It's not the first time San Francisco has found itself at the center of an immigration controversy.

In 2008, then-Mayor Gavin Newsom was the target of criticism over the city's policy of shielding convicted juvenile offenders who were in the country illegally from federal authorities, either escorting them to their home countries at city expense or transporting them to group homes, often outside the city.

Newsom, who was positioning himself to run for governor at the time, said the city had stopped the practice.

But news reports that eight young drug dealers in the country illegally from Honduras who were convicted in San Francisco walked away from unguarded facilities in San Bernardino County created an uproar.

The case against Sanchez became a divisive political campaign topic Friday after Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, who has come under blistering criticism for comments about Mexican immigrants, described it as "a senseless and totally preventable violent act committed by an illegal immigrant."

Immigrant rights groups say the San Francisco tragedy is being exploited politically to promote practices that have already been called into question in federal courts.

"Unfortunately, some will utilize this tragic, senseless death to try to impose immigration policies, city policies that are archaic and that are more harmful to the community than they are good," said Jorge-Maria Cabrera, a spokesman for the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles.

Activists pushing for stricter enforcement of immigration laws disagree. "If you can't deport an illegal immigrant who has been deported five times and is guilty of seven felonies, then who exactly is deportable?" asked Joe Guzzardi, national media director of Californians for Population Stabilization.

Day of Reckoning for Greek Banks and Eurozone's Central Banker // NYT // Jacl Ewing & James Kanter – July 5, 2015

FRANKFURT — No matter which way the Greek vote goes, the European Central Bank on Monday will face a series of agonizing decisions. Greece's future in the eurozone may well depend on how far the central bank is willing to go to prop up struggling Greek banks and prevent a total economic collapse.

If Greeks vote yes — agreeing to accept unpopular dictates from other eurozone nations and international creditors in return for more aid — the central bank would have a much easier time justifying emergency loans and other steps to keep the banks from failing. No economy can function properly without banks; if they topple, so will the economy.

But if Greeks vote no, Mario Draghi, the president of the E.C.B., may be confronted with a difficult choice. The central bank's rules would probably require it to stop providing cash to Greek banks. But Mr. Draghi might be tempted to find a way around those rules, because choking off financial support would thrust untold hardship upon ordinary Greeks and might send the country on its way out of the euro currency union.

Either way the situation is tricky, and there are no precedents to rely on.

"It's fair to say we can expect a few surprises in the next few days," said Nicolas Véron, a senior fellow at Bruegel, a research organization in Brussels. "Clearly, we are in uncharted territory."

The E.C.B.'s Governing Council is expected to hold a conference call Monday to discuss Greek banks in light of the election results. If Greeks vote no — rejecting further austerity measures, even though that could mean no further bailout help — the central bank might focus its energy on minimizing the collateral damage elsewhere in the 19-nation eurozone. One way to do that would be to pump money into the bloc's economy by stepping up the central bank's purchase of government bonds, and other debt, from other eurozone countries.

But for Greece, its banks pose the clearest immediate danger. For months, they have depended on the E.C.B.'s emergency loans to compensate for withdrawals of money by Greeks who are worried that their government would be unable to reach a bailout agreement with its creditors.

The extent of that dependency became clear last week after the central bank decided to cap the emergency loans at about 89 billion euros, or about $99 billion. Because much of that credit line had already been used, the borrowing cap forced the government to close the banks before they ran completely out of money.

Under central bank rules, no emergency loans may be made to insolvent banks. If Greeks vote no, it will be hard for Mr. Draghi and the Governing Council to maintain the pretense that Greek banks are solvent. For one thing, the banks have large holdings of Greek government bonds, which have already plunged in value and would probably fall further.

Mujtaba Rahman, the Europe director for the Eurasia Group, a political risk consultancy, wrote in a briefing note on Friday that a no vote by Greeks would probably tilt the balance of opinion on the Governing Council in favor of members from Germany, Latvia and other eurozone countries that want to take a hard line with Greece.

But the E.C.B. is treading carefully. It does not want to take the blame for any economic or humanitarian chaos that might ensue if Greek citizens choose to reject a deal with creditors.

Even if Greeks vote yes, banks may not reopen Tuesday as the government has promised. The banks have only about €1 billion, or $1.1 million, on hand, Louka Katseli, the head of Greece's banking association, said on Friday.

But a yes vote would improve the chances that Greece could negotiate a new aid package with the other eurozone countries and its other main creditor, the International Monetary Fund.

Those prospects could make it easier for the E.C.B. to justify an increase in emergency lending, perhaps allowing the banks to reopen soon, or at least continue dispensing limited amounts of cash. (Since last Monday's bank closure, the daily A.T.M. withdrawal limit for people with Greek bank cards has been €60, or about $67.)

When the Greece government's debt problems became evident during the financial crisis, leading to international bailouts of the country in 2010 and 2012, one big worry was that other European banks could be dragged down by losses on their Greek holdings.

By now, though, as European banks have sold off their Greek investments and new eurozone banking regulations have been put in place, that risk has been greatly reduced, according to the European Banking Federation, an industry trade group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"European banks in recent years have significantly reduced their exposures to Greece, greatly limiting the risk of contagion through the banking system to other countries," the British bank Barclays wrote in a briefing note on Friday.

Barclays said that other euro countries had exposure to Greece amounting to only 3.5 percent of the eurozone's gross domestic product and that exposure of European banks to Greece had fallen to less than one-tenth of that level.

But Barclays warned that the safeguards put in place the last five years were not "infallible."

Even if the E.C.B. and other eurozone countries decide that Greece's banks deserve a rescue, the process would be far from painless.

The central bank's emergency loans would not be a permanent solution. The longer-term fix would probably need to come from a war chest called the European Stability Mechanism that the eurozone countries set up during the financial crisis to guard against future calamities.

That fund was used in 2012 and 2013 to lend €41 billion, or about $45.5 billion, to the Spanish government to help rebuild the assets of Spain's banking system, which was teetering toward collapse. It was also used the next year to lend €9 billion, or about $10 billion, to Cyprus; some of those funds were used for its banks.

In the case of Cyprus, there were howls of protest when a eurozone bank bailout for the first time required some depositors to take "haircuts," or losses on their money.

But two years later, as the new Cypriot government that came to power during the crisis had met the bailout conditions set by the eurozone and the I.M.F., that solution has been deemed largely successful.

If a yes vote prevails in Greece, and the country — perhaps with a new government — can come to terms with its creditors, a Cyprus-style bank bailout might be part of the package. That is the view of Daniel Gros, the director of the Centre for European Policy Studies, a research organization in Brussels.

"There would certainly have to be a quid pro quo," Mr. Gros said, "and I'm almost certain that there would have to be some haircutting."

Spurned by the West, Georgians look to Russia despite past quarrels // WaPo // Michael Birnbaum – July 4, 2015

TBILISI, Georgia — In this fiercely pro-Western nation that fought a brief war with Russia in 2008, few thought the Kremlin could ever regain a toehold. But with the West backing away from Georgia's path to E.U. and NATO membership after a year of conflict in Ukraine, pro-Russian sentiments are on the rise.

The former Soviet nation's leaders are warning that Russia may yet prevail if Georgia is shut out from Western clubs. Wary of further provoking Russia, Western politicians have quashed talk of NATO and the European Union expanding eastward anytime soon. Russia has stepped into the vacuum, increasing its presence by opening Georgian-language outlets of its state-owned news network and deepening investments in the energy industry and other key sectors.

Similar movements are happening in other former Eastern bloc nations trapped between Russia and the West, in a tug of war that has deep Cold War resonance.

"Stability and security cannot be maintained with this paradigm, with Russia's paradigm of having special rights towards other countries," said Georgian President Giorgi Margvelashvili, in an interview in the presidential palace on a bluff overlooking the old city of Tbilisi. The blue-and-gold E.U. flag flies outside of the building, as it does at most Georgian governmental buildings, as an emblem of the nation's aspirations.

"Russia is working pretty actively, not only in Georgia, but all around the world" to expand its influence, he said. Despite the growing Russian presence, Georgia remains unshakably committed to eventual membership in NATO and the E.U., he said. As a token of its devotion, Georgia has sent more soldiers to Afghanistan to fight alongside U.S. troops in recent years than many nations already in NATO.

The germ of the present conflict between Russia and the West lies in an E.U. offer of closer ties to Ukraine and Russian President Vladimir Putin's infuriated reaction. E.U. membership for Ukraine was always a long shot — but it has become even less likely after fighting that has killed more than 6,400 people, according to U.N. estimates.

E.U. leaders squabbled at a summit in May about whether to offer even the faintest prospects for membership to Georgia, Ukraine and Moldova, which have said they want to join. The E.U. leaders decided against it, and they also delayed plans to ease visa rules for Georgian travelers, a bitter disappointment for Georgia's leaders. The E.U.

caution stemmed from a desire not to inspire backlash from Russia, diplomats involved in the discussions say.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who has taken the role of the lead European interlocutor with Putin, has played down expansion prospects. So has President Obama.

“Neither Ukraine or Georgia are currently on a path to NATO membership. And there has not been any immediate plans for expansion of NATO’s membership,” Obama said last year.

Now support for pro-Russian politicians in Moldova and Georgia is growing, while Ukraine is so consumed by conflict that it has made little progress in instituting overhauls necessary for westward integration. Armenia, a fourth post-Soviet country that had been in talks with E.U. leaders about a trade deal, last year abandoned the discussions altogether, allying itself with the Russian camp.

Many here say that Russia has skillfully outmaneuvered the West.

“The Russians are working to dominate this part of the world. They calculate, they plan and they know this region much better than the Europeans and Americans,” said Tedo Japaridze, the chairman of the Georgian Parliament’s foreign relations committee.

The United States has tried to offer consolation measures. U.S. troops did training exercises with Georgian soldiers in May, and Georgia’s leaders present an upbeat face about their westward efforts.

“We don’t have time to be disappointed,” said David Bakradze, the state minister on European and Euro-Atlantic Integration. “Our aspirations are irreversible.”

But some Georgians feel they have little to show for their long westward push. Some of those sacrifices have been made in blood in grueling deployments to Afghanistan, where they have been one of the top contributors of soldiers to the battle efforts per capita, even though they are not NATO members.

“More and more Georgians are feeling they haven’t gotten anything tangible from the West,” said Shorena Shaverdashvili, a prominent Georgian journalist. “There isn’t more love for Putin and Russia. It’s just a realization that we’re left face-to-face with Russia, and we have to deal with it.”

Spurned by the West, Georgians are starting to look elsewhere. Support for signing the E.U. trade agreement was at 68 percent in April polls from the National Democratic Institute, down from 80 percent immediately before the Ukraine crisis started. Support for Georgia’s joining the Russian-dominated Eurasian Economic Union, meanwhile, is up to 31 percent.

Part of the shift inside Georgia came with the ousting of President Mikheil Saakashvili, the Western-trained lawyer who ruled the country for a decade starting in 2003. Passionately anti-Russian and close to U.S. leaders, Saakashvili rarely missed a chance to jab at the Kremlin. The biggest eruption came in August 2008, when Georgian soldiers attacked Russian soldiers who were amassing in greater numbers on breakaway territories of Georgia.

The ensuing five-day war decimated Georgia’s military and led to Russia’s recognizing the independence of South Ossetia and Abkhazia. By 2012, many Georgians were ready to embrace the leadership of their nation’s wealthiest man, Bidzina Ivanishvili, who promised to improve relations with Russia while maintaining ties to the West.

The payoff for Georgia was swift. Russia lifted a ban on imports of Georgian wine in 2013, and trade spiked.

“Those people who are trying to help us, we just want to tell them, ‘Stop meddling with Russia,’ ” said Jemal Veliashvili, who works in a seed and fertilizer shop in Georgia’s Kakheti wine-growing region, in the green shadow of the Caucasus Mountains that form the border with Russia. He said his business had tripled since the ban was lifted.

Even though diplomatic relations with the Kremlin remain tense, Russia’s presence inside Georgia is strengthening. Just last month, Russia’s Sputnik news agency opened new offices here and started a Georgian- and Russian-language Georgian news service.

“Georgia should be neutral, and it should be militarily free,” said Archil Chkoidze, the leader of Georgia’s Eurasian Choice, a coalition of pro-Russian groups that says it has nearly 16,000 members.

For now, even some of Georgia’s most committed pro-Western politicians say that their best hope is to hold tight to their goals but to expect little from their partners.

“No one told us it was going to be easy,” said Irakli Alasania, the leader of the opposition Free Democrats. Alasania was defense minister until November, when he was ousted for being too pro-West, he says. The possibility of joining NATO "will only open up after Putin," he said.

Putin is widely expected to remain Russia's leader until at least 2024.

Iran Nuclear Talks Appear to Advance as Deadline Nears // WSJ // Jay Solomon & Laurence Norman – July 4, 2015

VIENNA—Key elements of a nuclear agreement between Iran and world powers appeared to be falling into place on Saturday, just ahead of a July 7 deadline, according to officials involved in negotiations in Austria's capital.

Still, senior American and Iranian diplomats stressed an elusive deal to end a 10-year standoff over Iran's nuclear program was far from certain.

But they said advances have been made in recent days on two of the thorniest issues confronting negotiators: the pace of sanctions relief for Iran and a United Nations investigation into charges that Tehran has secretly developed nuclear weapons technologies in recent decades.

A nuclear deal is aimed at blocking Iran's ability to move swiftly toward nuclear weapons in exchange for easing tight international sanctions. Besides the U.S., the group with which Iran has been negotiating includes Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China.

Meanwhile, the head of the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog said on Saturday that he had agreed with Iran's leadership to conclude an investigation into Tehran's alleged suspected nuclear weapons work by the end of the year.

"With the cooperation from Iran, I think we can issue a report by the end of the year on the assessment of the clarification of the issues related to possible military dimensions," Yukiya Amano, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told reporters in Vienna shortly after returning from Iran. Tehran says its nuclear program has been conducted purely for civilian purposes.

The IAEA has been seeking Iranian responses to 12 sets of questions it first raised in 2011 about Iran's past nuclear work, based on evidence suggesting Iran may have been developing nuclear weapons technology. The IAEA says that despite promising closer cooperation in November 2013, Iran has so far only partially addressed two of those questions. The agency says that to date, Tehran has balked at requests to interview key Iranian scientists and to visit alleged nuclear sites.

Negotiations continued in Vienna on Saturday despite the July 4 festivities in the U.S.

The American Secretary of State John Kerry held a string of meetings on Saturday with his Iranian counterpart, Foreign Minister Javad Zarif, according to U.S. officials. And U.S. Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz was in negotiations with Iranian atomic energy agency chief Ali Akbar Salehi. Some other foreign ministers from the six power group are due to arrive in Vienna for discussions on Sunday.

Iran and the U.S. have also made progress in recent days in addressing the tricky issue of sanctions relief, according to senior U.S. and Iranian officials.

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei has publicly demanded all economic and financial sanctions on Tehran be lifted at the time of an agreement. But Iranian negotiators in the past few days have committed in Vienna to a phased approach, where sanctions will be lifted as Iran takes specific steps to roll back its nuclear program.

That includes disconnecting centrifuge machines, reducing the country's nuclear stockpile and reconverting its heavy water reactor in the city of Arak so it produces less weapons-usable plutonium.

"On a certain date, Iran will start doing its share, and at the same time, the Americans and the Europeans will commit themselves to terminate sanctions at a certain point," a senior Iranian official said earlier this week. "So the commitment is made beforehand, and the actual termination will happen on the date that Iran will have finished its work."

A senior U.S. official had warned on Friday evening that the July 7 deadline could slip, as the two sides try to narrow differences on several key issues, including access to Iranian military sites, the timing of sanctions relief and the continuing questions about Iran's past nuclear work.

If Iran and the world powers meet the July 7 deadline, it would mean the U.S. Congress would only get 30 days to review an agreement. However, if no deal is reached before July 9, the U.S. legislature would have an additional 30 days to look over the accord. That would give skeptics more time to rally opposition.

Appearing to anticipate an agreement in Vienna, leaders of the Republican party in Washington, on Saturday stepped-up attacks on what they alleged were going to be weak terms.

“Obama administration officials have talked themselves into the delusion that the regime in Tehran will use a sanctions-relief jackpot to help its people,” said Rep. Ed Royce (R., Calif.), chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, on Saturday. “But Iran’s Supreme Leader isn’t looking to cut this deal because he cares about ordinary Iranians.”

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas
Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.
One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts. She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.
As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.
Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.
In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.
Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.
Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.
The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.
"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.
Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.
The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.
Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a “tour” of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia’s incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a “strategic” view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is

Gifts to Hillary Clinton's Family Charity Are Scrutinized in Wake of Book

Hillary Clinton's State Department was part of a panel that approved the sale of one of America's largest uranium mines at the same time a foundation controlled by the seller's chairman was making donations to a Clinton family charity, records reviewed by The Wall Street Journal show.

The $610 million sale of 51% of Uranium One to a unit of Rosatom, Russia's state nuclear agency, was approved in 2010 by a U.S. federal committee that assesses the security implications of foreign investments. The State Department, which Mrs. Clinton then ran, is one of its members.

Between 2008 and 2012, the Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative, a project of the Clinton Foundation, received $2.35 million from the Fernwood Foundation, a family charity run by Ian Telfer, chairman of Uranium One before its sale, according to Canada Revenue Agency records.

The donations were first reported in "Clinton Cash," a new book by Peter Schweizer, an editor-at-large at a conservative news website, about the financial dealings of Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton. A copy of the book, set to be released next month, was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The book is to be published by HarperCollins, a division of News Corp ., which also publishes the Journal.

The book adds fresh details to previous reporting by the Journal and others aboutpotential conflicts between Mrs. Clinton's private charitable work and her public activities as secretary of state. The Journal reported in February that at least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during her tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Josh Schwerin, a campaign spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for Democratic presidential nomination, said the Uranium One sale "went through the usual process, and the official responsible for managing CFIUS reviews has stated that the secretary did not intervene with him. This book is twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories."

The campaign on Wednesday also provided a comment from Jose Fernandez, a former assistant secretary of state who served as the department's principal representative on the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, which reviewed the sale. "Secretary Clinton never intervened with me on any CFIUS matter," Mr. Fernandez said.

In response to past questions about possible conflicts, Mrs. Clinton has said she is proud of the foundation's work. Earlier this week, she called the book a distraction from real campaign issues.

Mr. Telfer, in an interview Wednesday, said he made the contributions not for the sake of the Clintons, but to support his longtime business partner, Frank Giustra, a Canadian mining executive and longtime Clinton friend who co-founded the program to spur development in poor countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The donations started before there was any idea of this takeover," Mr. Telfer said. "And I can't imagine Hillary Clinton would have been aware of this donation to this growth initiative," he added.

The Fernwood contributions don't appear on the Clinton Foundation website, as was required under an agreement between the foundation and the Obama administration. A Clinton Foundation spokesman referred questions to the Clinton-Giustra program spokeswoman in Canada, who didn't respond.

Under the terms of the sale, the company said it wouldn't seek an export license to send uranium out of the country, and that executives at the U.S.-based unit would control the mine, according to a Nuclear Regulatory Commission report. Uranium One, now a fully owned subsidiary of the Russian nuclear agency, owns a 300,000-acre mine in Wyoming and could produce up to half of the U.S. output of uranium this year. Some members of Congress at the time wrote to the committee calling on it to block the sale.

The Journal confirmed some other instances detailed in the book about Mrs. Clinton's official activities and her family charity.

In June 2009, the Clinton Giustra initiative received two million shares in Polo Resources , a mining investment company headed by Stephen Dattels, a Canadian businessman, according to a Polo Resources news release. About two months later, the U.S. ambassador to Bangladesh pushed the energy adviser to that nation's prime minister to allow "open pit mining," including in Phulbari Mines, where Polo Resources has a stake, according to a State Department cable released by WikiLeaks. The company seeking to develop the mine is still waiting for government approval, according to the firm's website.

It isn't known whether the Clinton-Giustra program still owns the shares. Neither Mr. Dattels nor his foundation nor Polo Resources are listed as donors by the Clinton Foundation website. Mr. Dattels, who retired in 2013, and representatives for Polo Resources couldn't be reached for comment.

Irish billionaire Denis O'Brien, who heads a mobile-phone network provider called Digicel, won a $2.5 million award in 2011 from a program run by the State Department's U.S. Agency for International Development to offer mobile money services in post-earthquake Haiti. The firm won subsequent awards. Funds for the awards were provided by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, while USAID administered the program, with a top Clinton aide directly overseeing earthquake aid.

Mr. O'Brien has given between $5 million and $10 million to the Clinton Foundation since its launch. It is unclear whether Mr. O'Brien gave while Mrs. Clinton was at the State Department because of the way the foundation discloses its donations.

A USAID spokesman said the company met the criteria laid out in the Haiti Mobile Money Initiative. A spokesman for Mr. O'Brien said he couldn't be reached and declined to comment. The Clinton campaign didn't respond to request for comment on Polo Resources or Mr. O'Brien.

Dear Mary,

We're Counting on You - Make a Special Gift for Clean Water

2012 was a good year for the Chesapeake region. Maryland adopted a new law that will reduce polluted runoff into the Bay. And Virginia continued its ban on uranium mining for another year. But we need your special year end gift of $60 to continue this momentum into 2013!

We're expecting a major effort this year to lift the ban on uranium mining in Virginia, putting the health and water of many commonwealth residents at risk. 2013 will also be a critical election year in Virginia, with a new Governor to be elected and all the members of the House of Delegates up for election as well.

In Maryland, we are looking to pass legislation that would give us more information on what pesticides are used in the Bay watershed. We will be fighting to keep fracking from polluting our water and endangering the health of Maryland residents. And we'll be working to make sure that the runoff law passed in 2012 isn't weakened.

Your support will help us protect the Bay and communities throughout the region. Please help us continue our efforts to build a clean water future in the Chesapeake region with a generous year-end gift .

For clean water,

John,

Hoping you will give me your comments on this piece the WSJ as invited. A few changes from the prior draft I sent.

With regard to nuclear. I ran some numbers: on a consistent basis the whole sale cost of nuclear for a new plant would be about 7.5 cents/kW-h compared to natural gas ($4/MCF) of about 5 cents/kw-h.

As extreme case would be to offer a production subsidy of up to 2.5 cents/kW-h for the first 10 plants to see if learning brought the capital cost down from the over night cost of about $5000/kW. This would imply a cost of carbon displaced (from NG) of over $100/metric tonne, well above other available options. The direct approach just does not work.

80 Year-Old Woman Stabbed in Rishon Lezion Terror Attack

Three people were wounded Monday afternoon in a stabbing attack by a Palestinian in the central city of Rishon Lezion, a southern suburb of Tel Aviv. Two people — a man in his 40s and a woman in her 80s — were in serious condition, the Magen David Adom rescue service said. The third victim, 26, was lightly hurt. The attacker, identified by authorities as a 19-year-old Palestinian man from Hebron, stabbed the 40-year-old man from behind on a bus on Tarmab Street, got off the bus and ran to the adjacent Herzl Street, where he stabbed the elderly woman and the young man.

Israel Faces Tough Dilemma Over Palestinian Terrorists' Bodies

The question of whether or not to return bodies of Palestinian terrorists to the PA, especially from the Hebron region, is dividing the defense establishment. Amid the panicked public atmosphere, the security cabinet decided to vary its standard practice and begin delaying the transfer of the bodies of terrorists killed while committing attacks to their families. The shift was led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan, over the reservations of Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon and senior army brass.

Israel Presents Strategic Shopping List to US

A new squadron of F-15's, modern tanker aircraft, helicopters, the V-22 osprey tilt rotor, precision weaponry, and large-scale financial aid for the Arrow 3 missile program—those are just some of things Israel is demanding from the US in the framework of a security aid package. The aid package surpasses the typical annual aid package—which amounts to $3.1 billion. U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter said during Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon's visit that Israel would be the only country in the Middle East to receive the futuristic F-35 fighter, but Israeli officials also asked for a squadron of F-15's which are often considered the "work horse" of the air force.

Diplomats to Learn to Defend 'Legality of Settlements'

Foreign Ministry cadets will tour West Bank settlements and learn how to defend their legality, as well as hear lectures on Judaism and tour the City of David archaeological site in East Jerusalem, officials said Sunday, in a rightward shift for the country's diplomatic corps. The new additions to the cadet course are a joint effort of Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovel and Foreign Ministry director Dore Gold, a confidant of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Arab Rock Terror Reaches Haifa

Arabs in Haifa threw a rock that hit a Jewish youth in the head Saturday, and tension between Jews and Arabs in the northern port city has been growing, according to Rabbi Shmuel Sasson, who heads the Torah nucleus group in the city. Rabbi Sasson said police responses to Arab crimes sometimes tend to be "somewhat sleepy," and cited an incident in which an Israeli flag was burned. In another incident, Arabs threatened the local Jewish congregation and spilled garbage near the synagogue. In that case, police responded with alacrity, he said. "We hope they won't start raising their heads too high," the rabbi said of the local Muslim Arab population. "This is the feeling and atmosphere throughout the country. A feeling of uncertainty. Let's hope we remain on the quiet part of the scale."

Israel Relaxes Fire Restrictions Against Rock-Throwing Rioters

The Israel Police has relaxed its restrictions on the use of live fire against rioters, Israeli news website Walla reported on Sunday. According to the new directives, if an officer is confronted with rioters shooting fireworks, tossing Molotov cocktails, or hurling stones or rocks at close range with slingshots, he or she is permitted to use live fire to neutralize the danger. This is only allowed, however, "when there is a real danger of harm, death, or injury to a person's body." Police sources told Walla that in spite of the fact that the use of live fire is still a last resort, the new directives are a necessary adaptation of the old rules due to the life-threatening situations Israeli personnel have faced during the current wave of Palestinian violence.

At Rabin Rally, Clinton Urges Israelis to Choose Peace

At rally of 100,000 marking 20 years since assassination, former president says Israelis must decide how to complete Rabin's legacy; Peres, not allowed to speak from stage, urges two-state solution.

By Times of Israel Staff

Former US president Bill Clinton addressed some 100,000 people in Tel Aviv on Saturday night at the memorial rally marking 20 years since the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, giving a rousing speech about Rabin's legacy and Israel's way forward. He urged Israelis to complete Rabin's work by making peace with the Palestinians, saying Rabin knew that the risks of peace were less "severe" than the risks of walking away from peace.

Current US President Barack Obama later addressed the rally, in pre-recorded remarks in which he told Israelis that peace was "necessary, just and possible."

Clinton was introduced to the crowd by Dalia Rabin, the daughter of the late prime minister.

In heartfelt remarks recalling many personal moments with Rabin during the peace process that led to the signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993, Clinton urged Israeli society to choose peace and to pursue Rabin's legacy. He said the day of Rabin's assassination was probably the worst in his eight years as president.

"Rabin's legacy in one way is clear and untouchable," Clinton said at the rally. "He risked his life to create and defend Israel. He spent his life serving Israel to advance your values and your interests. and he gave his life so that you could live in peace."

"What does it all amount to? Now that is up to you," he said, adding that "all of you now must decide when your leave here tonight… how to finish the last chapter of his story."

He also said that Rabin did not want to "see Israel come to a democratic crossroads where it has to decide whether it is a Jewish state or a democratic state."

Rabin knew, Clinton said, that "the risks of peace are not as severe as the risks of walking away from it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Those who loved him and love your country are praying that you make that decision. May God bless this country," he said.

Speaking of the late prime minister's leadership, Clinton compared Rabin to the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and to Mahatma Gandhi, who were both killed by their respective fellow countrymen for pursuing policies their assailants opposed.

Rabin, said Clinton, knew the risks and he was aware that he could be killed by a fellow Israeli. At the same time, he added, Rabin "knew who he was, he knew what he believed, he knew why he loved Israel, he believed that democracy and freedom and peace were essential" to its people and to the people in this audience.

"You must decide how to finish his legacy, the last chapter must be written by people he gave his life for," Clinton charged.

Former president and prime minister Shimon Peres, who was not allowed by the organizers to speak at the rally — which was aimed to be non-partisan politically — told Army Radio that his message would have been, "We must make peace on the basis of two states." He said that goal "unifies" Israel's right and left. It was crucial, he added, that Israel maintain both its Jewish majority and its democracy.

Most speakers at the rally maintained a relatively non-political tone, but Rabin's grandson Yonatan Ben-Artzi urged from the stage that "Israel must recognize a Palestinian state."

The speakers addressed the crowd from behind a bullet-proof glass screen, organizers said, days after Hagai Amir, brother of Rabin assassin Yigal Amir, had posted on Facebook that Rivlin would soon "depart the world." Hebrew media reports said the screen had been installed at the last moment, at the request of American security officials, and that Israel's Shin Bet security agency had no objections.

At the memorial site where Rabin was gunned down, behind the square, his Labour Party held a small ceremony of its own earlier in the evening. At that event, current Labor and Zionist Union leader Isaac Herzog said "most of the Israeli public" now shared Rabin's vision, including "separation from the Palestinians and greater social justice, and vowed to fight for the causes Rabin espoused.

Clinton arrived in Israel on Friday and met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Reuven Rivlin.

Earlier Saturday, Rivlin gave the opening speech at the event, warning that Israel would not be cowed by violence and extremism.

He welcomed Clinton's address, saying "welcome, chaver [friend]," a sort of homage to Clinton's famous words at his eulogy for Rabin at the state funeral in Jerusalem following the assassination, during which Clinton memorably ended with the words "Shalom, chaver," or "Goodbye, friend."

President Barack Obama later also addressed the 100,000 people gathered at the Saturday event in a pre-recorded speech.

Peace Is Only Way to Ensure Security for Israel, Says Obama

In pre-recorded speech to Tel Aviv rally, US president pays tribute to PM, says 'a bullet can take a man's life, but his dream of peace will never die.'

By Tamar Pileggi

US President Barack Obama paid tribute to slain Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin on the 20th anniversary of his assassination via video message on Saturday night, declaring that Rabin's vision of peace remains "necessary, just and possible."

In a pre-recorded message broadcast in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square where organizers said some 100,000 Israelis gathered for the memorial rally, Obama related the murdered prime minister's legacy to the need to advance the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Calling Rabin "a warrior for peace," Obama recalled the night the late prime minister was gunned down.

"One the night he was taken from us, he looked at the thousands gathered and said that the path of peace was preferable to the path of war, and he exhausted every opening, every possibility in the pursuit of a just peace," Obama said.

Rabin, Obama said, "understood the challenges and dangers Israel faced and defended his country like a general."

Rabin "also said the Palestinians could not be ruled over forever by force. And, like a true statesman, he was willing to exhaust every opening, every possibility, in pursuit of peace," he said.

"The Jewish people have the right to live in their homeland, and Palestinians have the right to be a free people in their own land. And peace is possible, if both parties are willing to truly compromise and take risks for the only real solution — two states for two people; a democratic Jewish state living side-by-side in peace and security with a viable, independent and sovereign Palestinian state," Obama said.

"And in these difficult times, for Israelis, Palestinians, the region, Yitzhak's life and dream inspire us still," Obama urged. He promised the US "commitment" to Israel and its security "will never waver."

Obama recalled a speech he gave on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict during his presidential visit to Israel in 2013, where he said that peace was "necessary, just and possible."

"Peace is necessary, because it is the only way to ensure true and lasting security for Israelis and Palestinians," he said. "Peace is just," he said, "because the Jewish people have the right to live in their homeland and Palestinians have the right to be a free people in their homeland." It is possible, he said, "if both parties are willing to truly compromise and take risks for the only real solution: two states for two peoples."

“A bullet can take a man’s life, but his spirit and his dream of peace will never die,” Obama concluded, adding a blessing to all in the crowd and for all who seek peace and justice.

Book Questions Clinton Donations

By AMY CHOZICK APRIL 19, 2015

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/20/us/politics/book-questions-clinton-donations.html?_r=0

The book does not hit shelves until May 5, but already the Republican Rand Paul has called its findings “big news” that will “shock people” and make voters “question” the candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

“Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich,” by Peter Schweizer — a 186-page investigation of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by foreign entities — is proving the most anticipated and feared book of a presidential cycle still in its infancy.

The book, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, asserts that foreign entities who made payments to the Clinton Foundation and to Mr. Clinton through high speaking fees received favors from Mrs. Clinton’s State Department in return.

“We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds,” Mr. Schweizer writes.

His examples include a free-trade agreement in Colombia that benefited a major foundation donor’s natural resource investments in the South American nation, development projects in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake in 2010, and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

In the long lead up to Mrs. Clinton’s campaign announcement, aides proved adept in swatting down critical books as conservative propaganda, including Edward Klein’s “Blood Feud,” about tensions between the Clintons and the Obamas, and Daniel Halper’s “Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine."

But "Clinton Cash" is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations are expected to pursue the story lines found in the book.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have been briefed about the book's findings, which have already made their way into several of the Republican presidential candidates' campaigns.

Conservative "super PACs " plan to seize on "Clinton Cash," and a pro-Democrat super PAC has already assembled a dossier on Mr. Schweizer, a speechwriting consultant to former President George W. Bush and a fellow at the conservative Hoover Institute, to make the case that he has a bias against Mrs. Clinton.

And the newly assembled Clinton campaign team is planning a full-court press to diminish the book as yet another conservative hit job.

Mr. Schweizer and a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, which is owned by News Corporation and is publishing the book, declined to comment.

The timing is problematic for Mrs. Clinton as she begins a campaign to position herself as a "champion for everyday Americans."

From 2001 to 2012, the Clintons' income was at least $136.5 million, Mr. Schweizer writes, using a figure previously reported in The Washington Post. "During Hillary's years of public service, the Clintons have conducted or facilitated hundreds of large transactions" with foreign governments, he writes. "Some of these transactions have put millions in their own pockets."

Continue reading the main story

The Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for accepting foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state. Last week, the foundation revised its policy to allow donations from countries like Germany, Canada, the Netherlands and Britain but prohibit giving by other nations in the Middle East.

Mr. Schweizer's book will be released the same day former President Bill Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea, will host the Clinton Global Initiative gathering with donors in Morocco, the culmination of a foundation trip to several African nations. (A chapter in the book is titled "Warlord Economics: The Clintons do Africa.")

There is a robust market for books critical of the Clintons. The thinly sourced "Blood Feud," by Mr. Klein, at one point overtook Mrs. Clinton's memoir "Hard Choices" on the best-seller list.

But whether Mr. Schweizer's book can deliver the same sales is not clear.

Mr. Schweizer writes mainly in the voice of a neutral journalist and meticulously documents his sources, including tax records and government documents, while leaving little doubt about his view of the Clintons.

His reporting largely focuses on payments made to Mr. Clinton for speeches, which increased while his wife served as secretary of state, writing that “of the 13 Clinton speeches that fetched $500,000 or more, only two occurred during the years his wife was not secretary of state.”

In 2011, Mr. Clinton made $13.3 million in speaking fees for 54 speeches, the majority of which were made overseas, the author writes. Among the connections he tries to draw is a $750,000 speaking fee to Mr. Clinton by the Swedish telecom company Ericsson and a State Department list of new sanctions on Iran that did not include telecom.

Mr. Schweizer, president of the Government Accountability Institute, is the author of the 2013 book “Extortion: How Politicians Extract Your Money, Buy Votes, and Line Their Own Pockets,” and “Throw Them All Out” about elected officials receiving insider stock tips.

EXCERPT:

SPIEGEL: Would you hazard a prediction as to when most of the US troops will finally leave Iraq?

Maliki: As soon as possible, as far as we're concerned. US presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months. Assuming that positive developments continue, this is about the same time period that corresponds to our wishes.

SPIEGEL: Is this an endorsement for the US presidential election in November? Does Obama, who has no military background, ultimately have a better understanding of Iraq than war hero John McCain?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maliki: Those who operate on the premise of short time periods in Iraq today are being more realistic. Artificially prolonging the tenure of US troops in Iraq would cause problems. Of course, this is by no means an election endorsement. Who they choose as their president is the Americans' business. But it's the business of Iraqis to say what they want. And that's where the people and the government are in general agreement: The tenure of the coalition troops in Iraq should be limited.

FULLL TEXT OF INTERVIEW:

SPIEGEL: Germany was opposed to the war. The German economics minister was in Baghdad last week, Daimler AG plans to build trucks in Iraq, and you will travel to Berlin this week. Has everything been smoothed out between Germany and Iraq?

Maliki: We want closer relations, and it is my impression that the Germans -- the government, the people and German companies -- want the same thing. Our task is to rebuild a country, and the Germans are famous for effective and efficient work. We have great confidence in them and want to involve them in the development of our country.

SPIEGEL: And there is truly no resentment against a country that opposed the war in 2003?

Maliki: We do not judge our partners on the basis of whether or not they were militarily involved in toppling Saddam. The decisions back then corresponded to the national will of the countries, and we respect that.

SPIEGEL: What exactly do you expect from the Germans and from German companies?

Maliki: We want to get to know them, and we want to know what they want -- and the things they fear when thinking about Iraq. We have to start over again in many areas, including oil production, the development of the power grid and all industries. There is much to be done.

SPIEGEL: What do you expect from the Germans, politically and militarily? The Bundeswehr (German Armed Forces) occasionally trains Iraqi security forces -- but only in neighboring countries.

Maliki: What matters most to us is that we develop resilient political relationships and work together economically. Our security forces are steadily improving, partly as a result of German efforts. We will be pleased to turn to the Germans to equip our police and military; and should there be new training programs with the German Bundeswehr, we will be happy to accept their help. However, we would clearly prefer that the training take place in Iraq in the future. Overall, I believe that we are gradually becoming self-sufficient.

SPIEGEL: Three weeks ago, your government filed a civil lawsuit in New York against companies that allegedly paid bribes to officials in the Saddam regime. The defendants include three German companies: Daimler, Siemens and B. Braun Melsungen. How is this compatible with your overtures to German industry?

Maliki: We are in negotiations with Siemens for the construction of power plants, which shows just how serious we are. Whether the suit you mention succeeds will be for the courts to decide. Under no circumstances will the consequence be that we no longer wish to work with the companies in question.

SPIEGEL: Large parts of Iraq's assets abroad remain frozen -- and inaccessible to creditors. What will happen to this money when the UN Security Council mandate for Iraq expires at the end of this year?

Maliki: We have hired several international law firms to deal with these assets. At the moment, they are protected by UN resolutions, American law and the personal commitment of President George W. Bush -- and we want this protection to remain in place after the end of UN mandate on Iraq. We consider the claims being lodged against this money to be unjustified. Iraq cannot be punished for crimes that were committed by the dictator. This is very important to us, and a key aspect of our negotiations over the future status of US troops in Iraq.

SPIEGEL: Germany, after World War II, was also liberated from a tyrant by a US-led coalition. That was 63 years ago, and today there are still American military bases and soldiers in Germany. How do you feel about this model?

Maliki: Iraq can learn from Germany's experiences, but the situation is not truly comparable. Back then Germany waged a war that changed the world. Today, we in Iraq want to establish a timeframe for the withdrawal of international troops -- and it should be short. At the same time, we would like to see the establishment of a long-term strategic treaty with the United States, which would govern the basic aspects of our economic and cultural relations. However, I wish to re-emphasize that our security agreement should remain in effect in the short term.

SPIEGEL: How short-term? Are you hoping for a new agreement before the end of the Bush administration?

Maliki: So far the Americans have had trouble agreeing to a concrete timetable for withdrawal, because they feel it would appear tantamount to an admission of defeat. But that isn't the case at all. If we come to an agreement, it is not evidence of a defeat, but of a victory, of a severe blow we have inflicted on al-Qaida and the militias. The American lead negotiators realize this now, and that's why I expect to see an agreement taking shape even before the end of President Bush's term in office. With these negotiations, we will start the whole thing over again, on a clearer, better basis, because the first proposals were unacceptable to us.

SPIEGEL: Immunity for the US troops is apparently the central issue.

Maliki: It is a fundamental problem for us that it should not be possible, in my country, to prosecute offences or crimes committed by US soldiers against our population. But other issues are no less important: How much longer will these soldiers remain in our country? How much authority do they have? Who controls how many, soldiers enter and leave the country and where they do so?

SPIEGEL: Would you hazard a prediction as to when most of the US troops will finally leave Iraq?

Maliki: As soon as possible, as far as we're concerned. US presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months. Assuming that positive developments continue, this is about the same time period that corresponds to our wishes.

SPIEGEL: Is this an endorsement for the US presidential election in November? Does Obama, who has no military background, ultimately have a better understanding of Iraq than war hero John McCain?

Maliki: Those who operate on the premise of short time periods in Iraq today are being more realistic. Artificially prolonging the tenure of US troops in Iraq would cause problems. Of course, this is by no means an election endorsement. Who they choose as their president is the Americans' business. But it's the business of Iraqis to say what they want. And that's where the people and the government are in general agreement: The tenure of the coalition troops in Iraq should be limited.

SPIEGEL: In your opinion, which factor has contributed most to bringing calm to the situation in the country?

Maliki: There are many factors, but I see them in the following order. First, there is the political rapprochement we have managed to achieve in central Iraq. This has enabled us, above all, to pull the plug on al-Qaida. Second, there is the progress being made by our security forces. Third, there is the deep sense of abhorrence with which the population has reacted to the atrocities of al-Qaida and the militias. Finally, of course, there is the economic recovery.

SPIEGEL: Critics have accused you of striking harshly against the Mahdi army of Shiite leader Muqtada al-Sadr, while going easy on his rival Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim's Badr militia.

Maliki: That's not true. We proceed just as firmly against anyone who breaks the law. Just a few days ago, we had an incident with a group associated with the Badr people. The army moved in immediately and arrested them all. No one was spared. The punishment is based purely on the nature of the crime, not on the identity of the criminal.

SPIEGEL: In southern Iraq, where you come from, you have been compared with Saddam Hussein when it comes to harshness.

Maliki: That's the sort of thing that people say who don't understand how urgently Iraq needs stability -- or these people prefer instability. We don't want to spread fear and terror in Iraq. We have, for example, given the militias several deadlines to hand over their weapons. Their resistance was tremendous, so we had to oppose them with tremendous force of our own.

SPIEGEL: What role do you envision for your chief rival, Muqtada al-Sadr? Can there ever be national reconciliation in Iraq without his participation?

Maliki: You can only reconcile with someone who wants to reconcile. His Excellency Muqtada al-Sadr can be a political partner, especially if, to that end, he draws on the great spiritual legacy he has inherited from his ancestors. He has understood that his following was eventually infiltrated by criminal elements, by men from the former regime, al-Qaida people and others. The fact that he is now in the process of systematically separating himself from these elements makes him even stronger as a political partner. As a politician, I might add, not as a militia leader.

SPIEGEL: You spent part of your exile in Iran, and you have visited the country several times since you took office. Can you explain to us what the leaders in Tehran are up to? Are they building a nuclear bomb? Do you see this as a serious threat?

Maliki: I have not been made privy to the details of the Iranian nuclear program. Iranian representatives assure us, however, that this program serves peaceful purposes. Even if Tehran wanted to develop a nuclear weapon, it would take a very long time, simply from a technical standpoint. It is obvious that our region is far too fragile for even a single country to possess nuclear weapons, because it will always be an incentive for other countries to also build their own.

SPIEGEL: Exactly 50 years ago, the monarchy in Iraq was overthrown and a republic established. But we didn't see any celebration of this event at all. What does that day mean for the history of Iraq?

Maliki: There may have been people who celebrated. But certainly not all Iraqis. On July 14, 1958, and era came to an end, but what came afterwards didn't live up to our expectations and hopes. What came were decades of military putsches and the dictatorship. We are still dealing with the aftermath today.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, your job is probably one of the most dangerous a politician can have. How do you cope with this, and what do you do to make it bearable?

Maliki: I lead a very simple life -- one that is shaped by external forces, which is apparently what fate has determined for us Iraqis. In that regard, the past few decades of dictatorship have not changed all that much. What keeps me going? The constant exertion of my job -- and the successes we are now having. It means a lot to me to see how much closer we are today to a democratic Iraq, one that respects human rights, than we were only a few months ago.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, thank you for taking the time to speak with us.

Iraqi PM backs Obama troop exit plan: report
Sat Jul 19, 2008 7:38am EDT

BERLIN (Reuters) - Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki told a German magazine he supported prospective U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's proposal that U.S. troops should leave Iraq within 16 months.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes."

It is the first time he has backed the withdrawal timetable put forward by Obama, who is visiting Afghanistan and us set to go to Iraq as part of a tour of Europe and the Middle East.

Obama has called for a shift away from a "single-minded" focus on Iraq and wants to pull out troops within 16 months, instead adding U.S. soldiers to Afghanistan.

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

Maliki, who is due to visit Germany this week, has suggested a timetable should be set for a U.S. withdrawal but U.S. officials have been more cautious, despite an improving security situation.

The White House said on Friday President George W. Bush and Maliki had agreed that a security deal under negotiation should set a "time horizon" for meeting "aspirational goals" for reducing U.S. forces in Iraq.

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Some five years after the U.S.-led invasion, there are still some 146,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq.

TALKING POINTS: RAND PAUL'S FOREIGN POLICY

BACKGROUND: In a lame attempt to clarify his contradictory foreign policy positions, Rand Paul gave a speech last night that only left more questions about what are the real views of Rand Paul and what are just political posturing.

TALKING POINTS:

· Rand Paul's foreign policy is about as clear and predictable as rolling the dice.

· After being criticized for his extreme isolationist views, Rand Paul is now trying to back track on those positions.

· Rand Paul wants to have it both ways, claiming to be more of a hawk when it is politically convenient for him.

· This isn't the first time Rand Paul has flip-flopped on important issues for political reasons.

  o Rand Paul flip-flopped on Israel: After repeatedly claiming he would eliminate foreign aid, including to Israel, he now claims that he would not.

  o Rand Paul flip-flopped on ISIS: Rand Paul expressed reluctance to intervene against ISIS, only to change his mind a few months later.

  o Rand Paul flip-flopped Russia: Rand Paul was against standing up to Putin after the Russian leader sent troops into Georgia, but took a different stance after Russian troops entered Ukraine.

· In his speech, Rand Paul criticized Secretary Clinton and cited former Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and Pakistani activist and recent Nobel Peace Prize winner Malala Yousafzai, both of whom have praised Secretary Clinton for her leadership around the world.

· Rand Paul is quick to criticize the actions of our country's leaders after the fact, but he has never been in hot seat.

· With such an unclear and contradictory foreign policy position, it is impossible to predict the actions Rand Paul would take if he were ever the one making the decisions.

· Supporting Rand Paul's foreign policy would be the biggest, and most dangerous, gamble the American people could ever take.

Rand Paul flip-flopped on Israel. "Paul said, 'I haven't really proposed (phasing out aid to Israel) in the past.' That's rewriting history. Not only did Paul say he would eliminate all foreign aid during multiple media interviews in January and February of 2011, but as late as March of that year, his office released a budget proposal that included a zeroing-out of foreign assistance, with a section specifically inserted to defend the effect that policy would have on Israel. Paul is free to change his position, but saying he never held the position in the first place is flatly contradicted by his past statements and documents. We rate the claim Pants on Fire." ["Pants On Fire: I haven't really proposed (phasing out aid to Israel) in the past," PolitiFact, 8/7/14]

Rand Paul flip-flopped on ISIS. "After expressing reluctance to intervene against ISIS over the summer, Sen. Rand Paul abruptly shifted gears on Thursday and announced that he supports military action to eliminate the Islamist group. 'The military means to achieve these goals include airstrikes against ISIS targets in Iraq and Syria,' the Kentucky Republican and likely 2016 presidential hopeful wrote in an op-ed in TIME. 'Such airstrikes are the best way to suppress ISIS's operational strength and allow allies such as the Kurds to regain a military advantage.' [...] When ISIS initially captured large swaths of Iraqi territory in June, Paul's response was mainly to criticize former President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney for enabling ISIS's rise by launching the U.S. invasion of Iraq. In fact, Paul specifically argued that Obama didn't deserve scorn for failing to prevent the insurgent gains as a result. And while his new op-ed criticizes Obama for saying he still hasn't decided on a strategy to confront ISIS, Paul himself has made similar comments in arguing there might not be a viable strategy to defeat ISIS." ["Rand Paul's epic ISIS flip-flop," MSNBC, 9/4/14]

Rand Paul flip-flopped on Russia. According to Mother Jones, "So when Russia sent troops into Georgia (on George W. Bush's watch), Paul didn't want to provoke Russia by placing missiles in Poland. Yet today, when Russia moves into Ukraine (on Obama's watch), he's all for dispatching missiles to Poland to send a message to Putin. Does Paul care more about Crimea than Georgia? Or does he care more about keeping a foot on the GOP's anti-Obama bandwagon? Paul's office did not respond to a request for comment." ["Rand Paul's Big Flip-Flop on Russia," David Corn column, Mother Jones, 3/14/14]

Robert Gates: Sec. Clinton "made a singular contribution to strengthening this country's relationships with allies." Former Secretary of Defense Robert Gates: "In a world that is ever more complex, turbulent and dangerous, Secretary Clinton, 64, has made a singular contribution to strengthening this country's relationships with allies, partners and friends; rallying other countries to join us in dealing with challenges to the global order, from Libya and Iran to the South China Sea; and reaching out to people in scores of countries to demonstrate that America cares about them. She has developed, for the first time, long-range, comprehensive strategies for diplomacy and development that will strengthen the critical civilian contribution to America's national security abroad." [Robert Gates, Time Magazine, 4/18/12]

Malala: "A world with more women leaders will be a better world, and Hillary Clinton is helping make that possible." "Hillary Clinton is a symbol of strength for women across the world. It was she who famously said, 'Women's rights are human rights.' She not only spoke those words, but also dedicated her life to empowering women around the world through politics and philanthropy. She has been a source of strength for many women leaders, including myself, my family and those who stood by me after I was attacked. 'Continue your mission, be strong, we believe in you' is what she said to me, my father and the rest of the Malala Fund team when we met her last year at the Clinton Global Initiative awards. Her life and leadership show women what we can achieve if we believe in our own strength and if we channel our inner creativity, compassion and determination. A world with more women leaders will be a better world, and Hillary Clinton is helping make that possible." [Malala Yousafzai op-ed, 4/23/14]

TALKING POINTS: HARPER'S HILLARY HIT PIECE

BACKGROUND: Harper's Magazine published an attack essay on former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton by reporter Doug Henwood, misleading readers on Hillary Clinton's record and spreading a false narrative of Hillary Clinton's many decades of public service.

TALKING POINTS:

Folks with a political axe to grind have been trying to reinvent Hillary Clinton's legacy for decades. But Hillary only gets stronger because she has always been about a better future for everyone.

The latest anti-Hillary hit piece contains nothing new – it merely rehashes the same old stories from the same old hit men.

Relying on unreliable sources such as Dick Morris, the article is factually untrue and full of debunked information.

- The author even admits in the article that "his [Dick Morris'] pronouncements on both Bill and Hillary should be taken with a substantial grain of salt."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The article's criticism of President Clinton's economic policies completely ignores the fact that the 1990s were the longest period of growth in U.S. history and during Clinton's administration, 7 million people were lifted out of poverty and nearly 23 million jobs were created.

Repeating the same talking points we've heard from America Rising and Rush Limbaugh – from undermining Hillary's accomplishments to bringing up conspiracy theories from the past – the piece reads like a page straight out of the GOP playbook.

Despite these desperate attempts to undermine her accomplishments, Hillary Clinton's record speaks for itself.

- Hillary was crucial in expanding health care for millions of children.
- Senator Clinton repeatedly voted and introduced legislation to increase the minimum wage and played a pivotal role in securing billions for 9/11 funding.
- In the words of Bob Gates, Secretary Clinton "made a singular contribution to strengthening this country's relationships with allies."
- Since leaving the State Department, Secretary Clinton has focused on early childhood development, full global participation for women, electing Democrats, and her family.

The unprecedented support behind Hillary Clinton is a result of her vision and focus, making a real difference, supporting our families, improving our communities and enhancing the lives of all people.

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foreign Policy, "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As theWashington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted in increased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia ,Panama and South Korea) and 15 Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. “She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel,” recalled Jacobs. “And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer.”

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. “She said ‘I’m going to do what’s in the best interest of the U.S.,’ and that was the end of it,” Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, “although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it’s got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people.” He urged Jewish donors “to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits,” adding: “I’d hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support.”

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton’s senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

“It’s a tricky issue for her,” said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran “are going to put her in a box.”

Clinton’s allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. “I know where she stands, but I can’t talk about it,” Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, “She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don’t need to worry about this.”

He soon backtracked, saying “I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal.”

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

“For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy,” said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street’s PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

“She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community.”

1. Straight positive from DMR endorsement (DDMG)
2. Endorsement script that leans more heavily into the contrast language from the DMR (DDMG)
3. Endorsement buffet script - PP, gun groups, DMR, etc. (GMMB)

has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Programthat provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more fromher on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

NSN Daily Update: McCain's Foreign Policy Bad for Gas Prices

With all the focus on energy prices this week, it is important to remember that the candidates' foreign policies will have an important impact on gas prices. Experts believe that up to 30 percent of the current price of oil is due to instability in the world's largest oil producers, and any potential for confrontation only exacerbates the situation. John McCain's bellicose approach towards both Iran and Russia, two of the world's largest producers, will keep energy prices high.

While McCain and Obama have both presented plans for reducing energy prices it is important to remember that foreign policy has a major impact on world oil prices as well. Obama and McCain have both presented proposals for lowering energy prices, but those proposals cannot be viewed in a vacuum. We must also take into account the candidates' foreign policies. According to the Chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, Daniel Yergin, these national security concerns have built "an almost-permanent security premium' into the price of oil." In fact according to some estimates rising tensions in the world's oil producing hotspots have resulted in as much as a 30 percent increase in the price of oil. [NY Times, 8/05/08 ; NY Times, 8/05/08 ; NY Times 5/11/08]

John McCain and George Bush's foreign policy of unwavering confrontation with Iran has raised costly speculation about a future oil shock and led to an increase in oil prices. John McCain supports not talking to Iran and instead continuing the same strategies that have not worked for the last eight years, agreeing with George Bush's assessment of characterizing direct talks with Iran as appeasement. As John Kilduff, an energy analyst, has observed: "Well, I think at this point, the problem we have… is statements from the President and the Vice President, almost on a daily basis lately, really raising the rhetoric, raising the temperature on the situation…and this is the mother of all supply fears, the mother of all supply threats. Not only the Iranian oil, but the Strait of Hormuz, where 25 percent of the world's oil flows, that's 100 percent Western-friendly, could easily be blocked by the Iranians…we in the oil markets have to call them as we see them and take what we get in terms of rhetoric and worry." [NewsHour, 10/26/07 , John McCain, 6/2/08]

McCain's confrontational policies toward Russia, the world's largest exporter of natural gas and the second largest oil exporter, would only heighten the security premium. Russia's energy supplies are critical for Europe and impact world oil prices. It has not hesitated in the past to use its position as a major energy supplier for leverage and has, at times, resorted to cutting off gas supplies to consumer nations. McCain believes Russia should be excluded from the G-8. In a Foreign Affairs article published late last year, McCain advocated kicking Russia out of the G-8: "Today, we see in Russia diminishing political freedoms, a leadership dominated by a clique of former intelligence officers, efforts to bully democratic neighbors, such as Georgia, and attempts to manipulate Europe's dependence on Russian oil and gas. We need a new Western approach to this revanchist Russia. We should start by ensuring that the G-8, the group of eight highly industrialized states, becomes again a club of leading market democracies: it should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia." McCain repeated this view in his global vision speech at the Los Angeles World Affairs Council where he called for Russia to be kicked out of the G8. Strategy for Victory in Afghanistan
John McCain

I'm here today to discuss with you several issues that worry you and most Americans, our slumping economy, job loss, rising gas and food prices, and what we need to do to get our economy growing again, create jobs and reduce our dangerous dependence on foreign oil. But there is another urgent issue I want to address before I take your questions, which I know concerns you because brave Americans are risking their lives right now to deal with it.

Over the last year, Senator Obama and I were part of a great debate about the war in Iraq. Both of us agreed the Bush administration had pursued a failed [policy] there and that we had to change course. Where Senator

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama and I disagreed, fundamentally, was what course we should take. I called for a comprehensive new strategy -- a surge of troops and counterinsurgency to win the war. Senator Obama disagreed. He opposed the surge, predicted it would increase sectarian violence, and called for our troops to retreat as quickly as possible.

Today we know Senator Obama was wrong. The surge has succeeded. And because of its success, the next President will inherit a situation in Iraq in which America's enemies are on the run, and our soldiers are beginning to come home. Senator Obama is departing soon on a trip abroad that will include a fact-finding mission to Iraq and Afghanistan. And I note that he is speaking today about his plans for Iraq and Afghanistan before he has even left, before he has talked to General Petraeus, before he has seen the progress in Iraq, and before he has set foot in Afghanistan for the first time. In my experience, fact-finding missions usually work best the other way around: first you assess the facts on the ground, then you present a new strategy.

Although the situation in Iraq is much improved, another test awaits whoever wins this election: the war in Afghanistan. The status quo is not acceptable. Security in Afghanistan has deteriorated, and our enemies are on the offensive. From the moment the next President walks into the Oval Office, he will face critical decisions about Afghanistan.

Senator Obama will tell you we can't win in Afghanistan without losing in Iraq. In fact, he has it exactly backwards. It is precisely the success of the surge in Iraq that shows us the way to succeed in Afghanistan. It is by applying the tried and true principles of counter-insurgency used in the surge -- which Senator Obama opposed -- that we will win in Afghanistan. With the right strategy and the right forces, we can succeed in both Iraq and Afghanistan. I know how to win wars. And if I'm elected President, I will turn around the war in Afghanistan, just as we have turned around the war in Iraq, with a comprehensive strategy for victory.

That strategy will have several components. Our commanders on the ground in Afghanistan say that they need at least three additional brigades. Thanks to the success of the surge, these forces are becoming available, and our commanders in Afghanistan must get them. But sending more forces, by itself, is not enough to prevail. In the 18 months that Senator Obama has been campaigning for the presidency, the number of NATO forces in Afghanistan has already almost doubled -- from 33,000 in January 2007 to about 53,000 today. Yet security has still deteriorated. What we need in Afghanistan is exactly what Gen. Petraeus brought to Iraq: a nationwide civil-military campaign plan that is focused on providing security for the population. Today no such integrated plan exists. When I am commander-in-chief, it will.

There are, of course, many differences between Afghanistan and Iraq, which any plan must account for. But, as in Iraq, the center of gravity is the security of the population. The good news is that our soldiers have begun to apply the lessons of Iraq to Afghanistan -- especially in eastern Afghanistan, where U.S. forces are concentrated. These efforts, however, are too piecemeal; the work of innovative local commanders, rather than a strategy for the entire country. In particular, the U.S. needs to reengage deeper in southern Afghanistan, the Taliban heartland.

One of the reasons there is no comprehensive campaign plan for Afghanistan is because we have violated one of the cardinal rules of any military operation: unity of command. Today there are no less than three different American military combatant commands operating in Afghanistan, as well as NATO, some of whose members have national restrictions on where their troops can go and what they can do. This is no way to run a war. The top commander in Afghanistan needs to be just that: the supreme commander of all coalition forces. As commander-in-chief, I will work with our allies to ensure unity of command.

A successful counterinsurgency requires more than military force. It requires all instruments of our national power, and that military and civilian leaders work together, at all levels, under a joint plan. Too often in Afghanistan this is not happening. And we need to build the same kind of civil-military partnership that Gen. Petraeus and Amb. Crocker have forged in Iraq, supported by the best talent in the U.S. government and the resources necessary to prevail. Unity of command is also a principle I will bring to Washington. Too often, even as American soldiers and diplomats cooperate in the field, their superiors back home have been squabbling. Last year, the Bush administration appointed a war czar, responsible for both Iraq and Afghanistan. This was a step in the right direction. But Afghanistan is sufficiently important that a separate Afghanistan Czar is needed. I will appoint a highly-respected national security lea der, based in the White House and reporting directly to the President, whose sole mission will be to ensure we bring the war in Afghanistan to a successful end.

Everyone knows the United States increased the number of its soldiers in Iraq last year. What's less well known is that the Iraqis surged with us, adding over 100,000 security forces to their ranks. It's time for the Afghans to do the same. The Afghan army is already a great success story: a multiethnic, battle-tested fighting force. The problem is, it's too small, with a projected strength of only 80,000 troops. For years, the Afghans have been telling us they need a bigger army, and they are right. We need to at least double the size of the Afghan army to 160,000 troops. The costs of this increase, however, should not be borne by American taxpayers alone. Insecurity in Afghanistan is the world's problem, and the world should share the costs. We must work with our allies to establish an international trust fund to provide long-term financing for the Afghan army.

We also need to increase our non-military assistance to the Afghan government, with a multi-front plan for strengthening its institutions, the rule of law, and the economy in order to provide a sustainable alternative to the drug trade. Getting control of narcotics trafficking is central to our efforts in Afghanistan. Alternative crops must be able to get to market and traffickers must be arrested and prosecuted by enhanced Special Courts. We should agree on specific governance and development benchmarks with the Afghan government, then work with them closely to ensure they are met.

Just as we have worked over the past 18 months to stabilize Iraq by bringing together its neighbors, this kind of diplomacy is just as important for Afghanistan. The violence there has many causes, but chief among them is the fact that Afghanistan is treated by some regional powers a chessboard on which to pursue their own ambitions. I will appoint a special presidential envoy to address disputes between Afghanistan and its neighbors. Our goal must be to turn Afghanistan from a theater for regional rivalries into a commons for regional cooperation.

A special focus of our regional strategy must be Pakistan, where terrorists today enjoy sanctuary. This must end. We must strengthen local tribes in the border areas who are willing to fight the foreign terrorists there -- the strategy used successfully in Anbar and elsewhere in Iraq. We must convince Pakistanis that this is their war as much as it is ours. And we must empower the new civilian government of Pakistan to defeat radicalism with greater support for development, health, and education. Senator Obama has spoken in public about taking unilateral military action in Pakistan. In trying to sound tough, he has made it harder for the people whose support we most need to provide it. I will not bluster, and I will not make idle threats. But understand this: when I am commander -in-chief, there will be nowhere the terrorists can run, and nowhere they can hide.

In wartime, judgment and experience matter. In a time of war, the commander-in-chief doesn't get a learning curve. If I have that privilege, I will bring to the job many years of military and political experience; experience that gave me the judgment necessary to make the right call in Iraq a year and half ago. I supported the surge because I believed it was our only realistic chance to reverse the disaster our previous strategy had caused, and the right thing to do for our country. And although events have proven me right, my position wasn't popular at the time, and I risked my own political ambitions when I took it. When I tell you, I will put our country's interests -- your interests -- before party; before any special interest; before my own interests, every hour of every day I'm in office, you can believe me. Because for my entire adult life, in war and peace, nothing has ever been more important to me than the se curity and well-being of the country I love. Thank you.

Question & Answer

- jokes "we have some work-release people here with the microphone" so be patient
- 1Q)What would be wrong with telling Americans to buy gas from people who help us (e.g. American-owned) and not from those who hurt us (e.g. Citgo, Chavez)?
    - MCCAIN: I think you're right. The American people are starting to understand that this transfer of $700B / year of your money is a security issues, enviro issue, economic issue. There's compelling evidence that some of that money goes to people who hurt us. We can do this through wind, tide, solar, hydrogen, hybrid, flex fuels. A few areas: (1) if the states want to, we should be offshore drilling right now. Obama opposes it. BTW, Crist says it's a good idea. In Cali, governor thinks it's a bad idea. Off louisiana, they've had 2 hurricanes without any real problems. (2) tax dollars for pure research and development--that's how we got the Internet. (3) Let's give lower-class Americans a little break--gas tax holiday. (4) Nuclear power. 80% of French energy is from nuclear, they are reducing greenhouse gases. It's safe. We should both re-process and stores it. Obama opposes doing either. We've sailed navy ships for 60 years with nuclear plants on them--they're safe. (5) Lexington Project. we need to embark on a national mission. when JFK called to go to the moon, we got there sooner than anyone expected. We can do it soon. "and then we can tell these countries we're importing from to take a hike."

- 2Q) How would you address the impact of Iran on Israel?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: All americans are concerned with growing threat. Ahmedijenad, "the quote 'President' of Iran." In recent days, they have tested missiles. It's a very serious situation. I believe we are seeing a positive response from our European friends. I have called for a LEague of Democracies. Russia and China, especially Russia has and will veto. Czechoslovakia. At the end of the day, America can never allow a second Holocaust

- 3Q) Do you support the total repeal of the estate tax, which is unfair to farmers? What about the farmer subsidies
  - MCCAIN: The estate tax is onerous and i think "death tax" is a better description. Those tax breaks are about to expire in 2010; I'm worried about sudden and unexpected deaths right before (laughs). I support Kyl's proposal.
  - MCCAIN: I also have to give you straight talk. I opposed the farm bill, Obama supported it. I don't think we can afford to give this money to asparagus growers, etc. I want to do everything to support the family farm, but I oppose the bloated $300B farm bill. Maybe you want to make an argument, but I've never accepted it because I've never supported a farm bill. I'll open every market in the world to your products. I believe in free trade. Colombia is the largest importer of American goods--the same country that just freed those hostages. Pelosi wont allow a vote on the Colombian FTA, and those tariffs are giving us an unlevel playing ground.

- 4Q) [child asks] What will you do to help families and children?
  - MCCAIN: [asks to repeat the question] After this question if you feel like taking a nap, you're more than welcome to. The best thing we can to for families is give you a quality education, not hand off to you a bankrupt government, make sure that SS and Medicare will be there when you retire, and that any money you pay in taxes because your success we'll have stopped this outrageous spending spree--I'll restore trust and confidence in government.

- 5Q) What's your vision for the future of our national labs?
  - MCCAIN: Research in new technologies is as important now as it's ever been because of our dependence on foreign oil. At an event of mine in Cali, there were Silicon Valley people that had developed a more efficient car with a more efficient one on the way. If there were a battery that powered a car, and the government could help, and it were affordable, people would get it. Look at the evolution we've had with cell phones--huge and expensive initially and now small and they're giving them away.
  - It's not the government's role to build that technology, get it onto the market--that's for private enterprise.
  - I also want to point out the large # of NM people in the military and the NM guard and I want to thank them.
  - shout-out to Congressman Pierce, who "i believe will be joining me in the United States Senate"
- Pearce: MCCAIN doesn't mince words. It's going to restore confidence. we're not a Democratic or GOP country, we're an American country.

- McCain-- Normally I don't take questions from members of the press during these events, but I'm making an exception. introduce yourself.
- 6Q) [Scholastic Kids news reporter]: When do you plan to announce the selection of your VP running mate?
  - MCCAIN: As soon as we can. It's a difficult process because we have so many highly-qualified choices.
  - FOLLOW-UP: What qualities are you looking for in a VP running mate?
  - MCCAIN: Someone exactly liek you. Young, vigorous, talented. They should share my principles, priorites and my values. VP only has 2 big responsibilities: (1) tie-breaking senate vote, (2) inquire as to health of the President

- 7Q) What are you going to do about sky-rocketing costs of college?
    - MCCAIN: Make sure every American qualified to do so can received a quality educaiton. We have good student loans but cost of educaiton making it too difficult still. We should encourage service to country that then provides them help with it: TFA, Americorps, military. It doesn't incentivize people to serve--people do so out of their own noble instincts--but it rewards them. I would expand them. We just passed the GI bill that increases educational benefits to military people--and allows them to transfer benefits to their families and children if they stay in long enough . Webb and I had a disagreement but we resolved it. We need to hold down costs of education--we need to work with schools to do so. Finally, there's a shortage of math experts, so I will focus on providing those opportunities to pepole like my daughter who graduated with a degree in art history. We need to have more engineers, etc. to insure the future of our nation.

- 8Q) Things are hard for entrepreneurs. How are you going to secure prosperity for the economic backbone of this country, small businesses?
    - MCCAIN: you epitomize to me what America is all about. If we let you down, we let America down. (1) We need to eliminate dependence on foreign oil, because you can't pass all that cost down to your customer. (2) I will not raise your taxes. If you think otherwise, I'm not your candidate. (3) We must continue with free trade. I still believe Americans are the greatest and strongest economy, but small businesses are the only bright spot in the whole dismal economic picture. net loss of 400K jobs, but a growth of 233K jobs in small business. The last thing i want to do is raise your taxes or mandate health insurance that will cost you. Those decisions should be made by you not by the federal goverment.
    - without getting too emotional about it, when I think about America, I think about you "and your partner there" (awkward laughter)... corrects "your friend--don't mean to get personal". you're the backbone.

- 9Q) I'm going to school on GI bill right now. I'm halfway through my bachelor's program and my benefits are about to run out. So i want to hear from the straight talk express, why do you not support the new GI bill?
    - MCCAIN: The initial studies for the original bill said that retention would drop 16%. We need to retain people, highly-trained people. We've resolved this, the only thing left is transferability and I'll continue working on that. I just want it to apply to everybody, unfortunately they won't accept it beyond people who joined after 9/11.

- 10Q) The SCOTUS can undo in a minute what took years to pass. Where do you stand on the new DC gun law?
    - MCCAIN: One of the most important abilities of the POTUS is the nomination of federal judges, especially to the SCOTUS. I'm proud of my support of Roberts and Alito. I will always nominate people with strict adherence to the - Straight talk: i voted for Breyer and Ginsburg, not because I agreed with them ideologically, but because elections have consequences and because they were qualified. Plus, the votes were overwhelming toward them. Obama voted against Alito and Roberts because he didn't agree with them ideologically. There is a strong divide between myself and Obama because he opposed "conservative judges". I want judges who follow strictly to the Constitution and nothing more.

- 11Q) Worried more about the 60million people south of the border who are getting benefits.
    - MCCAIN: We want to get rid of this extended family situation. 1986 amnesty/immigration bill failed because we didnt' secure our borders and now people dont' trust us. We have to secure our borders, then we have to have a temp worker program with tamper-proof biometric IDs--this is separate from people waiting in line legally. And we have to deal with the 12M people here in a human way. When I went to the floor with Kennedy, it was not popular with parts of GOP.
    - Drug problem. I met with the Mexican president. Mexican police are being assassinated, all related to drug trade to USA. So we have to address that to secure our borders. Corruption there is a huge problem. I'm not predicting armageddon but a Mexican official said that the drug trade is threatening the stability of the Mexican government. Colombia is one of the biggest problems. And we're telling them no free trade. We need the Maurita plan. We need to do a better job of educating young Americans about drugs.

    - I know how to fix it. I've reached across the aisle. And that's because I've always put my country first. Americans want a restoration of trust and confidence. Congressional approval is down to 9%. Today Senate majority leader said we're not going to pass appropriations bill, says we're not going to take up a bill for offshore drilling, says we're going to do nothing. Why should we do nothing when Americans are hurting? They're not going to miss a recess and they're not going to miss a pay raise. I'm going to shake them up. I'm going to stop wasteful pork-barrel spending. I'm going to make them famous.
    - NM is going to be important. They're going to say I need this state, that I need 2 new Congressman from this area, etc. But it's not jsut that I need them, you need them too. And it's ok to disagree, that's what Americans are about. We need to fix so many issues. I put my country first. There was a time when I was offered to leave first from the POW camp. But I had a Mexican-American friend there named Everett Alavarez and we couldn't do that. I will always put my country first.

Jackson says what HRC and other like her are doing is creating this idea that black people have to be afraid of the cops. Says at the end of the day, Sandra Bland very well could have had a fear around what could happen if you're stopped by a cop. Fox & Friends . 2015 07 24 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, Kevin Jackson on HRC and Sandra Bland

-- Preview of HRC's capital gains tax speech today. John Barrasso joins the show and says HRC's support for the capital gains tax shows that she wants to punish people for success. Says we know what works to grow the economy and we need to get more people back to work. Says we can get more money into the treasury is to get more workers. The problem isn't that we are taxed too little, but rather that the government spends too much. Says HRC wants to raise taxes so she can spend more. Varney & Company . 2015 07 24 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, John Barrasso on HRC economic agenda

-- Preview of HRC's capital gains tax speech today. Charlie Gasparino says every democratic candidate needs a Wall Street boogie man. Says HRC has too many supporters in private equity and at Goldman, so hers is in the form of activist investors, who she says are in it for the short term gain that she says is hurting the economy. Varney says HRC is taking what she thinks is the moral high ground. Gasparino says HRC looks at polls and this is the only option she has for going after Wall Street. Varney & Company . 2015 07 24 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, Gaparino on HRC and activist investors

-- Leslie Marshall says HRC will win the nomination despite her the issues facing her this week. Says the plan HRC has been laying out keeps in line with what democrats are talking about with income inequality. Varney says you have redistribution in the name of fairness versus growth. He thinks that people would choose growth and tax cuts. Marshall disagrees and say HRC could win with her current policies. Varney & Company. 2015 07 24,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Leslie Marshall on HRC economic plan.mp4

-- Coverage of HRC's economic speech focusing on capital gains tax to encourage long-term investing. Greg Taxin says HRC's plans are bad for the economy and is looking to put some artificial impediments in the way of the free flow of capitalism. Says HRC is making this mistake of conflating the length of time you hold the stock with your interest. John Heilemann then comments on HRC's capital gains tax plan and says the proposal is bringing together the ideas of Center for American Progress and people in the investment community. Says the Obama administration learned that the question of executive compensation is what a lot of people get really upset about. Says that could be a more politically explosive discussion. Taxin counters that the capital gains tax inhibits innovation because people who would be investing in start up will pause when thinking about moving their money. Market Makers . 2015 07 24,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Criticism of HRC capital gains tax.mp4

-- Coverage of HRC's economic speech today. Trish Regan says HRC wants to essentially double taxes on capital gains. Panel joins the show to comment on HRC's plan. Ashley Webster says it takes away the incentive for people to invest in the market. Says this is HRC's way of going after and demonize the rich. Chad Morganlander says the topic HRC should be focused on is business investment and how to incentivize that and says HRC touched on it a little. Regan says we didn't hear much about the billionaires funding HRC's campaign. Brad Blakeman says it's hypocrisy since HRC and WJC make so much on speeches. Richard Fowler says this is a good thing because it incentivizes pension and mutual funds to get in the marketplace and invest in long term investment. Says we have to invest in long term investment if we want to turn the economy around. Says we can only build infrastructure when we do long term investment. Morganlander says HRC was thin on giving real solutions to building the standard of living for people. Chris says at least she's putting forth substantive policy proposals which is more than we've seen from any other candidate in three weeks. Says as for the speeches, HRC gets taxed on those and all HRC is saying that people should be taxed on investments as income. You're taxing the gain, not the investment, and incentivizing long term investment. The Intelligence Report with Trish Regan . 2015 07 24,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Panel comments on HRC capital gains tax.mp4

-- Grover Norquist comments on HRC's capital gains speech. Says if the stock market doesn't go down in the next few weeks people are saying they don't think HRC is going to be the next president. Says this is a truly stupid tax proposal and doubles the present rate to 43%. Says the whole point of a free market economy is that people can move freely to move stocks. Says it won't be indexed for inflation and is trickle down taxation.

Says the incentive to buy stocks is way down under this proposal. Norquist says HRC has a tax policy to force you to stay in for a long haul. Risk and Reward with Deidre Bolton . 2015 07 24,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Grover Norquist comments on HRC capital gains tax.mp4

-- Coverage of HRC commenting on Black Lives Matter. Shows clip of HRC saying that for a lot of well-meaning white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still invokes a feeling of fear and we can start by saying black lives matter. Host notes that HRC at one point said all lives matter. Shows clip of Jeb Bush saying we're so uptight that we apologize for saying all lives matter. Juan Williams says the far left is missing the high moral ground of saying that all lives matter. Says HRC and the other democrats are trying to respond to the intense pressure from the far left. Background Information

After more than 20 months of negotiations, the United States and its negotiating partners announced a nuclear agreement with Iran. Throughout the negotiations, AIPAC outlined five critical criteria for a good deal. Unfortunately, the proposed agreement is fundamentally flawed in each of these vital areas.

The Iran Nuclear Agreement Review Act of 2015 established a procedure for congressional review of any nuclear agreement with Iran. Congress must now oppose this deal, which would leave Iran as a nuclear threshold state, thereby jeopardizing U.S. interests and posing an existential threat to Israel and other American allies.

Please call or email your members of Congress today and urge them to oppose this deal.

Phone Script

"I am calling to urge the senator/representative to oppose the Iran nuclear deal because it will not block Iran from getting a nuclear weapon."

Talking Points

- I have consistently supported diplomatic efforts to peacefully prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. I appreciate the hard work of the administration to reach a deal.
- Unfortunately, the proposed deal will let Iran become a threshold nuclear weapons state and will not guarantee international inspectors access to suspicious sites in Iran.
- Congress and the president have repeatedly said, "No deal is better than a bad deal." This is a bad deal.
- Congress must oppose this agreement, and urge the administration to negotiate a better deal that will truly prevent Iran from building a nuclear weapon.

Ad Watch: McCain Campaign Fabricates Support for Renewable Energy in False, Misleading New Ad

Washington, D.C.—The Sierra Club today denounced a new John McCain ad, "Family," as completely false and misleading. The ad attacks Barack Obama and then goes on to tout McCain's supposed support for renewable energy and energy independence. McCain has a long record of consistently voting against renewable energy.

The ad can be viewed at: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_3DxDBH9nn4

Partial script:

Text on screen: McCain Energy Plan [images of wind turbines]

Announcer: Renewable energy to transform our economy, create jobs and energy independence. That's John McCain.

John McCain Offers Nothing More Than Empty Rhetoric on Renewable Energy
John McCain talks about renewable energy every single day, yet has actively opposed the policies needed to make the clean energy economy a reality.
John McCain—like President Bush, coal companies, and the utility industry—opposes a Renewable Electricity Standard and has consistently voted against such a standard in the past. (Sources: 2005 Senate Vote #141, 6/16/2005; 2002 Senate Vote #50, 3/14/2002; 2002 Senate Vote #55, 3/21/2002; 2002 Senate Vote #59, 3/21/2002)
John McCain believes the renewable energy industry is "doing fine" and doesn't need any incentives. While he offered a $300 million gimmick on electric cars, he has voted against $290 million for clean energy. Meanwhile, John McCain favors billions in new and existing subsidies for dirty, dangerous, and distracting nuclear power. (Sources: Grist, 10/1/07; 2006 Senate Vote #42, 3/14/2006)
If key clean energy incentives that are in danger of expiring soon are not renewed, it could cost more than 116,000 hardworking Americans in the wind and solar industries alone their jobs and sacrifice $19 billion in economic growth. Twice, when every single other Senator voted and measures to renew these critical incentives lost by just a single vote, John McCain didn't even show up to vote when he could have made the difference. (Sources: Navigant Consulting study, 02/04/2008, http://www.awea.org/newsroom/pdf/Tax_Credit_Impact.pdf; 2007 Senate Vote #425, 2008 Senate Vote #8)

Statement of Cathy Duvall, Sierra Club Political Director

"It's shameful that John McCain and his campaign continue to deliberately mislead voters about his record on renewable energy. Hundreds of stump speeches and millions of dollars in ads cannot change a two decade-long record of consistently voting against renewable energy.

"While his ad may talk about creating jobs, John McCain's failure to support key clean energy tax incentives could cost the 116,000 hardworking Americans in the wind and solar industries alone their jobs. It will also sacrifice billions in lost economic opportunity.

"John McCain could've been the deciding vote on this issue twice -- something that would've truly helped America's workers and moved us toward energy independence -- but he was the only Senator who didn't even bother to show up and vote. And just last week, John McCain's allies in the Senate blocked extending these energy incentives twice because they were determined to hold Congress hostage in order to push the Bush-McCain-Big Oil energy agenda at all costs.

"When it comes to energy independence, America needs a plan -- not political platitudes. All talk and no votes -- that's John McCain."

Israel Separating Palestinians, Israelis on WB Buses

Israel on Tuesday launched a pilot program under directive from Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon to separate Israeli and Palestinian bus travel in the West Bank. Palestinian workers will now have to return from Israel to the West Bank via the same checkpoint they left and will not be allowed to ride Israeli bus lines. The new regulations, implemented by the Civil Administration, could lengthen some workers' commutes by as much as two hours, according to the human rights organizations that plan to appeal against the new rules to the High Court of Justice.

PM: Iran Jihadi Threat Top Priority for New Govt'

Benjamin Netanyahu formally presented his new cabinet at the President's Residence in Jerusalem on Tuesday, and vowed to put the fight against Islamist extremists at the top of his agenda. "This government has been established at a time of great challenges and opportunities," Netanyahu said. "Our first challenge is to ensure the security of Israel in the face of accumulating threats around us. Radical Islam is lapping at all our borders, nearly all in the form of factions and forces led by Iran and other radical elements." He said, however, that the country would seek to forge new alliances given the regional turmoil, hinting at Israel's shared interests with Sunni states against Iran.

Herzog Mocks PM's Chances of Reigniting P. Process

A day after Benjamin Netanyahu was quoted saying in closed conversations that he wants to restart the peace process, opposition leader Isaac Herzog expressed doubt on Tuesday that talks would begin while Netanyahu is in power. Herzog mocked the prime minister's decision to distribute the former responsibilities of the Foreign Ministry among six different Likud politicians, including putting vice premier Silvan Shalom in charge of the currently nonexistent peace talks with the Palestinians. "There may be a peace process between Netanyahu and Silvan Shalom," Herzog said. "Spreading out the Foreign Ministry's functions shows it's just another example of Netanyahu's circus."

PM Meets FIFA to Block Pal' Suspension Attempt

FIFA President Sepp Blatter, in Israel to try to resolve the crisis between Israel and the Palestinian Authority over suspending Israel's membership in the international soccer association, met Tuesday with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The purpose of the meeting was to seek a solution to Palestinian complaints that Israel is restricting the movements of Palestinian soccer players in Gaza and the West Bank. A senior official in Jerusalem said Israel wants to find a solution that will stop a planned vote on a Palestinian resolution to suspend Israel, at the FIFA congress on May 27. Netanyahu said at the start of his meeting with Blatter that any attempt to politicize sports – which he said could destroy FIFA, soccer's international governing body – should be stopped.

Uri Ariel Taunts Obama on Twitter over Jerusalem

US President Barack Obama received a rude welcome on his newly opened personal Twitter account on Tuesday from a right-wing Israeli minister who made it clear the new government in Jerusalem has no plans to cease construction in disputed areas of the capital. Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel of the pro-settler Bayit Yehudi party wrote: "Welcome! Happy Jerusalem Day! In case u didn't hear PM Netanyahu: "Jerusalem won't be divided again, we build all over the city." Ariel's tweet elicited angry reactions from Israeli Twitter users, one of whom wrote: "You remind me of a pyromaniac who lights things on fire and then rushes to tell his friends so that they don't miss the blaze."

Israel: US Enabled Iran Plane Deal despite Sanctions

A senior Israeli official took a swipe at Washington on Tuesday over Iran's purchase of second-hand civilian aircraft, saying the acquisition violated US sanctions and went ahead despite a tip-off from Israel. Iranian Transport Minister Abbas Akhoondi was quoted on May 11 by the Iranian Students News Agency as saying Tehran bought 15 used commercial planes in the last three months. He did not say who sold them or how they had been acquired. A long-standing ban on the export of aircraft spare parts to Iran was eased under an interim nuclear deal between Tehran and world powers in late 2013, but the US sanctions regime continues to restrict sales of planes. "Israel learned from intelligence sources about this very significant breach of the sanctions in advance of it occurring," said the Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Fatah to Hamas: Stop Direct Negotiations with Israel

Arab diplomats told the Jordanian newspaper Al-Dustour yesterday that Israel has been holding direct talks with Hamas about the establishment of a floating seaport in the Gaza Strip, among other issues. In response, Fatah has called on Hamas to stop the talks immediately, arguing that those talks "contradict the national Palestinian interest." A statement issued by a Fatah spokesman, Osama al-Qawasme, and which was published by the Palestinian news agency, Wafa, noted that the talks between Hamas and Israel served Israel's interests, since Israel "aspires to separate between the Gaza Strip and Palestine." He went on to say that the Palestinian Authority was the only entity that had the right to hold talks with Israel about ending the occupation." Ahmed Yousef, a Hamas official in the Gaza Strip, said in April that talks were being held between Hamas and Israel about a truce by means of Turkish mediators.

UN Envoy to Israel: Freeze Settlement Construction

The new UN Middle East envoy has called upon Israel to freeze construction in the settlements and to take more steps to resume the negotiations with the Palestinians. The envoy, Nikolai Mladenov, said at a meeting of the UN Security Council that he would work with UN Secretary General Ban and with the new government of Israel to see if the negotiations could resume for a two-state solution according to a logical timetable.

Israel's Netanyahu Stops Short of Creating a Ministry of Magic

By Ruth Eglash

In his inauguration speech on Thursday, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu decried the problems he faced piecing together a ruling coalition despite an unexpected win at the polls in March.

Indeed, it took "King Bibi" nearly two long, arduous months to reach agreements with four other parties to create the new government. He needed a minimum of 61 lawmakers to secure a majority — the slimmest possible — in Israel's 120-seat parliament.

No one here was too surprised by the frantic political negotiations or by Netanyahu managing to pull it together for the fourth time. But what has left commentators — and the public — a bit perplexed is the mishmash of ministries that were announced, some of which he was forced to create to keep senior members of his own Likud party happy.

1. Prime minister, minister of foreign affairs, minister of health, minister of communications, minister of regional cooperation — Benjamin Netanyahu*. Yep, that's right, Netanyahu will head at least five ministries.

There are several theories about why he kept these slots for himself, especially at the expense of one of his party's most senior and popular lawmakers, Gilad Erdan. For now, Erdan, the outgoing interior minister, will remain outside the government. According to media speculation, the Likud No. 2 had been hoping to receive a top ministry — education, justice or foreign —but that never materialized.

While the education and justice portfolios were dished out as part of deals to other parties, it is still unclear why Netanyahu is holding on to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Some commentators believe it is because the prime minister wants to use the position as a bargaining chip to lure in another coalition partner, possibly opposition leader Isaac Herzog, and strengthen the government. Only time will tell.

2. Minister in the Communications Ministry — Ofir Akunis*. Previously a deputy minister, Ofir Akunis was bestowed the role of "minister in the Communication Ministry." And, no, that is not a typo.

When the formal announcement was made by a Likud spokesman on Thursday, some journalists asked whether there was a mistake in the title. But the flack confirmed that Akunis would be 'a minister in the Communications Ministry' — which, of course, will be run by none other than the prime minister.

Perhaps to quickly save face, Akunis's new job description was revised to the more respectable title of "minister-without-portfolio" … to serve in the Communications Ministry.

3. Minister of science, technology and space — Danny Danon*. Far-right lawmaker Danny Danon was fired from his post as deputy defense minister after criticizing the government's restraint during last summer's war with Hamas in Gaza.
However, when Netanyahu appointed him science, technology and space minister, the question was not how the oft-outspoken politician managed to patch things up with the big boss, but rather: Whom exactly he is representing in outer space?

Almost immediately a host of memes appeared on social media, as well as two Facebook pages that poked fun at Israel's new "minister for alien affairs." They garnered thousands of "likes." However, in response to questions about his new position and title, Danon explained in a radio interview that, in fact, his predecessor, Yaakov Peri, had created the title. And, he insisted, it was fitting because Israel does have a serious space program.

4. Minister of immigrant absorption and strategic affairs — Ze'ev Elkin.* Immigration to Israel is called "aliyah," which in Hebrew means "the act of going up" or "ascending," and encouraging aliyah among Jews around the world is one of the primary functions of the Immigrant Absorption Ministry.

It's true that Ze'ev Elkin, a former deputy foreign minister who served as chairman of the coalition in the last government, might have gained invaluable experience keeping the peace between warring ministers. But encouraging aliyah at a time when Israel faces all sorts of strategic external threats might prove a little more tricky.

5. Minister of senior citizens, gender equality, young people and minority affairs — Gila Gamliel.* It sounds a bit like a 5-year-old's glued-together art project: Former deputy minister Gila Gamliel, one of the youngest members of the new government, will be responsible for the country's elderly, its youths, its minorities and its women. Basically, a ministry for anyone who is not white, male and between 25 to 65 years old.

Good luck with all that.

Al Monitor – May 20, 2015

Netanyahu's New Government Already on Shaky Ground

By Ben Caspit

Israel's Knesset convened May 18 for its first official meeting since the presentation and swearing-in of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's new government. The new ministers have begun getting accustomed to the new, difficult political reality forced on them. Since Netanyahu's fourth government is based on a very slim majority — 61 supporters in the coalition versus 59 in the opposition — ministers and Knesset members (MKs) in the coalition will have to remain firmly grounded, ready to vote at any given moment in the Knesset plenum.

Until today, an "offset," or quid pro quo, system had been customary in the Israeli parliament. This meant that coalition MKs could go on trips abroad and otherwise be absent from the plenum as much as they wanted as long as they could produce the name of a corresponding MK in the opposition who agreed to "offset" him or her — in other words, be absent from the same meetings and votes. As of now, the offset method has been revoked, and all leaves have been canceled. Everyone, and that means everyone, is confined to the plenum in a brittle, rare and terrifying balancing act.

MK Eitan Cabel, chairman of the Zionist Camp faction, which has 24 MKs, said on opening day that he has no intention of founding a "humanitarian exceptions committee" to give passes to unfortunate MKs who need to travel abroad.
"They are in the coalition," said Cabel, "and they need to win every vote. We in the opposition only need one vote to topple the government, and we'll do it."

Is it really so simple?

The burning question of the day is what is the anticipated life span of Netanyahu's government, balanced on a hair's breadth? Indeed, the government is already threatened by former popular minister and senior Likud Party member Gilad Erdan choosing to remain outside the festivities and the government, practically a one-man opposition against the prime minister. Well, different people have different answers to the life-span question.

Newbie opposition member and former Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman was quoted by associates as saying in closed talks May 18 that the government will fall faster than we think, "within months, maximum a year." An additional, fascinating question is: How long will it take for Liberman to get tired of the frustrating life in the opposition after being accustomed to a cushy, extended tenure in the Foreign Ministry?

Meantime, Liberman swears he's enjoying every minute of it, but the strong impulses that led him to take revenge on Netanyahu and topple him still exist and in full force. Liberman has no intention of giving up. He represents an alternative to Netanyahu on the right and is waiting in a dark corner for the right moment. The only problem is that the corner is shadowy, shabby, and boring.

Netanyahu will try his utmost to enlarge the government. The problem is that at this point, he has no options. Zionist Camp leader Isaac Herzog, with whom he had been in indirect contact in recent weeks, slammed the door in his face with a belligerent opposition speech during the swearing-in ceremony of the new government. Yesh Atid leader Yair Lapid is not interested because it would be political suicide for him to join Netanyahu's government. In any case, the ultra-Orthodox parties would veto Lapid. Liberman? The hatred between the two men broke new records.

Given this state of affairs, Netanyahu will try to "fish" for isolated Knesset members in various parties to raise the quota of coalition MKs even by another two or three members. Here, too, however, there is no good news. Only one MK, former journalist Sharon Gal, who joined Liberman and serves in the Knesset under him, is viewed as a "possible target" for courting by Netanyahu. It's doubtful that Gal will make the move, and even if he does, it's doubtful that it will be sufficient.

Still, under the current system it's hard to bring down a government. The main obstacle faced by Netanyahu is the budget, which must pass before the end of the year. If he fails to pass a budget, with his razor-thin majority his government will fall. Another possibility is a no-confidence vote, but now, in contrast to the past, the opposition needs 61 hands to topple the government, plus it has to present an alternative government as well. This is no easy task. Thus, Netanyahu's real existential threat is his finance minister, Moshe Kahlon.

In the course of the coalition negotiations, Kahlon made it clear that he would not join a 61-member coalition, because it will be difficult for him to pass the reforms he plans. Reality slapped Netanyahu in the face, however, and the only coalition he was able to assemble was the narrow coalition that Kahlon feared. Thus the way for the opposition to undermine Netanyahu's government is to try and make Kahlon's life miserable, torpedoing his reforms in the hope that he'll get sick and tired of it and dissolve the government on his own. This is the scenario that worries Netanyahu as well.

Meanwhile, the new government is breaking all previous records in contradictions and fallacies suffered by its predecessors. The best example is Silvan Shalom, who also almost remained outside the government, joining at the last minute. Shalom received the Interior Ministry portfolio — minus the planning and construction jurisdictions, which were given to the finance minister — and the empty title of "vice prime minister."

Recently, it was publicized that Netanyahu had appointed Shalom to be "responsible for conducting negotiations with the Palestinians" and for "dialogue and strategic relations with the United States." We must remember that the current government has no active foreign minister, because that portfolio remains in Netanyahu's hands. Shalom, like many other Likud higher-ups, has expressed many times over the course of the past year that he is against a Palestinian state and the two-state solution. So, what kind of negotiations can he hold with the Palestinians? What exactly will he negotiate?

Netanyahu announced on Jerusalem Day, May 17, that Israel's capital will never be the capital of any other nation or state, slamming the door on all attempts to renew negotiations. After only 24 hours, the Jerusalem Post quoted Netanyahu's associates as saying that he aims to "renew the talks with the Palestinians." This leak was meant to serve as a welcoming greeting for Federica Mogherini, EU high representative for foreign affairs and security policy, who is due to arrive in Israel May 19 for meetings with Netanyahu and other high-level officials. It is clear to everyone involved that Netanyahu and Israel cannot continue to juggle so many balls in the air for much longer.

During his ultra-right-wing election campaign, the prime minister announced that a Palestinian state would not happen. Afterward he moderated his tone and began to talk again about negotiations, although his coalition makeup does not lend itself to any kind of flexibility and negates the basic assumption of any future peace agreement. How does one untangle this mess? Netanyahu hopes to go with the flow of events, to buy time and survive until the expiration of the serving American president's term.

And speaking of Barack Obama, let us also mention that he is responsible for Netanyahu's most important moment this week. Contrary to previous assessments, the president said that the chances for achieving peace between Israel and the Palestinians are very slim at the moment, mainly because of the composition of Israel's coalition. In Jerusalem, they breathed a sigh of relief, but also raised a worried eyebrow. What was behind Obama's announcement?

At the beginning of his second term, Obama had staked his political capital on the goal of achieving peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Will Obama now give the European Union the green light to start a campaign of boycotts and ostracism of Israel, including passing a resolution in the Security Council on outlines for an agreement with the Palestinians, thus gradually transforming Israel into a pariah state? Jerusalem has been receiving scraps of information indicating that this is, indeed, the direction in which things are headed.

“We’ll cross that bridge when we come to it,” Netanyahu’s people say. At the moment, they are battling enough fires on the domestic front. They’ll deal with the global front later.

Mitt Romney 2

Mike Huckabee 5

Fred Thompson 7

John McCain 8

Event Details:

- Giuliani held two events in IA, two events in IL, two events in FL, two events in CA and one event in Texas 12/6-12/12. This pattern evidences a "Feb. 5th State" strategy.
- He attended the GOP Univision Debate in Miami on 12/09/07.
- He appeared on NBC on 12/09/07 (transcript below).
- He attended the GOP Iowa debate on 12/12/07.
- While in TX for Romney's religion speech, one of our trackers was denied entry into a Giuliani fundraiser in the area.
- While in Florida on 12/06/07, Giuliani hosted a Web "House Party" event.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- In Cedar Rapids, IA, Giuliani hosted a town hall where approximately 130 supporters showed, but our tracker noticed several of empty seats.

Key Quotes from Web "House Party":

On Health Care: "I don't want Hillary's bureaucrats to run your health care, I want you to run your health care. That's the thing that makes America great. America is not great because of it's central government; America is great because of its people."

On Iran:

"We should increase the sanctions. Obviously the pressure worked in 2003, if the national intelligence estimate is correct. The pressure worked in 2003 to get them to back off their nuclear program. And what happened in 2003? What big thing happened in 2003? We deposed Saddam."

"The main sponsor or biggest sponsor of international terrorism."

"The end result is we should consider Iran a country that is an irresponsible regime."

On the Economy:

"If you can hold down the growth of government, you can reduce taxes. If you can reduce taxes, you can put a lot more people to work. I see lower taxes as more jobs."

On Meet The Press:

Giuliani played "defense" on Meet the Press on 12/09/07.

Event Details:

- Romney held four events in FL, four events in IA, two events in MI, one event in NY and four events in TX 12/6-12/12. In terms of sheer number of events and the scope of their geography, Romney's team is the most organized and hard-working of all the campaigns.
- He attended the GOP Univision Debate in Miami on 12/09/07.
- He appeared on ABC on 12/09/07.
- He attended the GOP Iowa debate on 12/12/07.
- Romney spoke to packed houses at his events in IA this week. One event in Cedar Rapids attracted over 700 people.
- One of our trackers was able to get into and record Romney's big speech on faith on 12/06/09. This was no easy feat. Our tracker had to get passed the Secret Service to get in. We have the full video in house and in the process of being categorized and uploaded to a viewer-friendly site.

Results from Romney's 'Faith in America' Speech:

Poll: Romney speech fails to sway voters' opinions on Mormons (Salt Lake Tribune, 12/11/07)

Despite Mitt Romney's passionate plea for voters to look beyond doctrinal differences between his Mormon faith and other Christian religions, a new [Gallup] poll shows virtually no change in Americans' willingness to cast a ballot for a Mormon candidate.

Romney released an attack ad against Huckabee this week:

In New Ad, Romney Attacks Huckabee on Immigration (New York Times, 12/11/07)

Mitt Romney 's presidential campaign plans to begin running a negative television advertisement today in Iowa highlighting Mike Huckabee 's record on immigration , escalating the warfare between the two Republican candidates as they scramble for support in the nation's first nominating state.

On the draft:

> Q: "When is Congress and all the candidates gonna realize that our American army is spread out as thin as mayonnaise on a hamburger sandwich, or ham sandwich, and we need to reinstate the draft. We need to reinstate the draft to make sure, to send a strong message to the terrorists all around the world, from all walks of life, that we maintain our army and uh be free…"

A: " …Let me respond to your question on the draft. And that is, I do not believe we should have draft or we need to return to the draft to have a strong and able military. And I believe, I believe that in part because I've seen the experience of what happens if we, if we provide to our military the kind of benefits and rewards that America should provide. In my state we had, we saw every-year we saw about 6% of our enrollments in our National Guard going down; down 6% a year. And then the legislature and I passed something known as the 'Welcome Home Bill'. And it said that if you signed up for the National Guard you'd get four years tuition and fee-free at any Massachusetts public institution of higher learning. And our enrollments went up 30%. Men and women said 'Yeah, I want that. I want to be able to have that, that uh military career and I want that education.' And so I want to make sure that we provide the benefits to our young men and young women which make it a good deal and an interesting opportunity for them to be able to serve in the military.

And so that's, in my view, how we'll be able build the troops from our current 1.5 million approximately, active duty, to about 1.6 million, which I think is the number that we need. I also think we're gonna have to increase our military funding from about 3.8% of our economic activity to about 4%. That doesn't sound like a lot; but that little change in percent takes us up about 40 or 50 billion dollars a year, will allow us to build new equipment, to buy new equipment for our soldiers to be safe and to be successful, and also allow us to take better care of our veterans."

On illegal immigration and his personal ties to it:

> Question from Dana Bash of CNN: Governor, both in the mail and on the stump, and even on television, you talk about how tough you are on immigration. And yet you allowed contractors to be at your house who clearly had illegal immigrants working for them. Do you see a paradox there?

A: What I see is that we have a country where there is not an employment verification system, that allows contractors, that allows companies to know who's in the country legally and illegally. And I certainly have never proposed that homeowners have a responsibility, when they hire a contractor or a company, to then go out and inquire of the company's employees whether they happen to be illegal or not. That's not the, that's not the course of this country, it's actually… potentially even against the law. So its not something that as a, as a homeowner, I'm able to do, its not something that's available under our current system in this country. And that's why I proposed that instead we have an employment verification system, to identify which aliens are here legally which are not here legally. On that basis companies that do the hiring would be able to do the assessment. But the individuals at my home were not my employees. They were hired by a company, the company made a fault, made a mistake in judgment, and that's why I terminated the relationship with them.

> Q: If I may follow up sir, you're running as someone who is a CEO, who is really focused on issues like this. Like judgment, not an average everyday citizen; so, should people look to you as someone who would have the judgment or perhaps take the extra mile to make sure that no illegal…

A: And what's, and what's the extra mile?

> Q: To make sure… especially if you're trying to be president.

A: Tell me how you would do that in this country? So for instance, let's say I go to a restaurant. Should I make sure that all the waiters there are all legal? How would I do that?"

> Q: You knew that this company had illegal immigrants before…"

On Energy and Terrorists:

"It is secondly important that we can fuel ourselves. One of the most urgent tasks of the next president had better be to lead this country to energy independence not in twenty… not in thirty years… (inaudible). I am no longer willing to pay for both sides of the war on terror. Having my tax dollars fund the military to fight it, but the gasoline and oil dollars pay for the other side to send the terrorists against us." (Meet and Greet; Greenville, SC 12/08/07)

On previous statements on AIDS:

"I have to stand by what I said. And the fact is it wasn't unusual for us to do something unlike the medical protocols. Medical protocol typically says that when you have a disease for which there is no cure, and you are uncertain about the transmission of it, that the first thing you do is quarantine or isolate the carriers."

Citing Progressive Leaders:

"In my lifetime I've seen four major cultural shifts, which is what we're talking about here, a cultural shift not a programmatic shift. Four cultural shifts in my lifetime, litter, seat-belt use, smoking, drunk-driving. Go all the way back to the mid-60s. Litter was a huge problem. Lady Bird Johnson said that 'we need to keep America beautiful.' And so we started a campaign to do that… The same thing happened with seat belts. I remember when seat belts didn't exist in cars and they were an after-market device. Nobody had a seat-belt… And Ralph Nader kept pushing it. Next thing you know, we put the seatbelts in the car by congressional mandate in the late 60s…"

Note: He did NOT mention Reagan at this event.

On Health Care/'Socialized Medicine':

Q: Why are all Republican candidates frequently misusing the term "socialized-medicine" when they refer to any Democratic candidates' healthcare plans?

A: "Cause we want to win," (laughter). I think the idea, to be fair, I think Republicans and Democrats both somewhat have it wrong. The Democrats say we want the government to run your healthcare system, frankly some of the Republicans, their only answer is we want the insurance companies to do it. My position has been neither of those; I don't trust the insurance companies, I don't trust the government, I trust me. I don't want a third party person making the decision on whether or not I get surgery, or what kind of test is going to be run.

You know why? They're not looking after my interest, they're looking after their own. And whether its an insurance company or a government don't ever think you're gonna be better off if you turn your basic healthcare needs over to someone who doesn't love you as much as you need to love yourself… An insurance company ought to be a provider but not necessarily the personal decision-maker. And so that's why I believe in personal ownership of your plan that has portability…"

On Mormonism:

Q: Would you like to take the opportunity to clarify your recent statements on whether Mormons are Christians?

A: Well, today, after the uhh debate, I personally went to Mitt Romney. I apologized for the comment that was in the, I guess it was all over the news, all over the place. It was excerpted out of an article that is going to appear this week. And it raised the question, it said, I asked a question about Jesus and Satan. The conversation, and we talked to a reporter at the New York Times, who was I think as shocked as we were that even became this news story. It was in a discussion that lasted over several hours… He was asking me about the whole issue of my faith and then it drifted to what I think about Mormonism. I said I don't want to talk about someone else's faith, I can barely keep up with being a Baptist, and I sure don't know much about being a Mormon. And I simply didn't go there, and I haven't gone there. And so then he was saying, but there are some different things about Mormonism. He obviously knew more about it then I did. In the course of that conversation, honestly, I raised the question, I asked, is this part of their beliefs. The next thing I know, I mean it was in the story, and it was even quoted in the story as an innocent question. But no-one believed it was an innocent question, they thought I was trying to throw something out there. I was horrified when I read that.

And I apologized to Mitt Romney because first of all, I don't think his being a Mormon or not being a Mormon has a thing to do with being president. And I would never say that a person should for or against anybody because their of any faith. Umm, I don't think people should vote for or against me because I'm a Baptist… Mitt Romney's Mormonism is not an issue, as far as I'm concerned, in his qualification to be President…."

- Thompson held two events is IA 12/6-12/12.
- Thompson's wife held one event in SC this week as well. However, the event lasted only a few minutes.
- He attended the GOP Univision Debate in Miami on 12/09/07.
- He attended the GOP Iowa debate on 12/12/07.
- The media's characterization of Thompson as 'lazy' is not inaccurate. His events are often very short and a very few. In fact, it looks like he'll be narrowing his campaign stops to even fewer places – NH is not longer part of his strategy:

> Thompson Rules Out N.H. (CBS, 12/11/07)
> The Thompson campaign confirms to CBS News that Thompson will not campaign in New Hampshire before January 3rd to concentrate on Iowa. On Friday night, he hinted at this but the campaign made it official today.

- He attended the GOP Iowa debate on 12/12/07.
- At two separate events, our campaign staff was able to get questions asked. (see transcript below)

On Iran and the NIE:

Questioner Tim Lisewski: "Senator, General Petraeus today said that the Iranians have stopped arming the insurgents in Iraq and you have been pretty tough, like President Bush has, on Iraq and you seem to be (McCain: "you mean Iran"), well I mean Iraq and Iran. I just wondered what your opinion is on the latest NIE.

McCain: "Well, um, I'm interested that General Petraeus said that today, if he did, I did not see the report because uh, when I saw him last week, he said that they didn't know and so I would have to also check it out. I think he said there were some indications of reductions of some of these explosive devices coming across the border, but they were still coming across and I think that is what it was. I believe that the Iranians are not acting in the national security interest…" ….

"So, um I would be willing to have a dialogue with Iran if it's necessary to do so. I wouldn't necessarily do it with the President of Iran. Blackberries work, communications work, intermediaries work, ambassadors work, uh, but I don't believe that Iran has abandoned in any way shape or form their ambition to exert Persian influence in the region. That has been the case for thousands of years and I don't think it's changed and I believe that they are oppressive and repressive(?) and unfair government and everybody I have talked to whose word I trust says the same thing. There is always an element in America, it was there when we thought Hitler was a nice guy, we thought, it was there when we thought Stalin was a nice guy. And there have been many times where we thought that some of these foreign countries and their leaders, uh, shared our values and our principles. I don't think the Iranians do, not that government. Go ahead, give him back the microphone. Go ahead"

Tim: "So, do I understand you would use diplomacy rather than a military, you know, viewpoint on Iran."

McCain: "No leader in the world, hold on to the microphone, no leader of the United States of America would say they would use a military option. But to completely remove the military option is not something I would do. I would certainly, certainly exercise sanctions, exercise any effort that I can, because when we send our young men and women into harms way that's the most difficult decision of all. Okay? Thank you very much."

On 527's:

"We do have, unfortunately, the 527s, the MoveOn.orgs. Those are not a violation of our law. Perhaps they, we should have been more specific on that, but the '74 law, the 1974 law applies to these people, and, uh, if I could just quote it very quickly, it says any organizations that, that engage in partisan political purposes to influence the outcome of elections are subject to campaign contribution limits. So the Federal Elections Commission, the commission that's set up to enforce this, basically has not enforced this, and if they did it was on a case-by-case basis rather than prohibiting all of it. This is how you get MoveOn.org and George Soros, uh, spending hundreds, I'm told, hundreds of millions of dollars to affect the outcome of political campaigns. It's got to be stopped. It's got to be stopped. And by the way, again, I don't mean to, to continue on this, but I'm sure you all know about the full-page ad that MoveOn.org took out in the New York Times with a picture of General Petraeus and said 'General Petraeus or General Betray Us. You know, there's, there's no place in America for that, for that kinda thing. And so I want it stopped, I will try to get the 527s stopped."

More on MoveOn (and Iraq):

"This is an organization that a couple of months ago, took out a full-page ad in the New York Times, with a picture of General Patreus on it. And it said: 'General Patreus or General Betray Us.' A disgraceful attack on a patriotic American…

Well the same organization today said that the Democrat senators that are running for president have to pledge to filibuster the bill that funds the young men and women and their mission in Iraq today… We are winning in Iraq. And we can win. And we will win."

Cost of war:

"If the Democrats have their way and we set a date for surrender, we will pay a horrendous cost in American blood and treasure in the future."

(Town Hall; Bedford, NH 12/07/07)

On military families poll:

> Questioner Tory Brown: "I've read a poll today that said that 60%, I believe, of military families, don't believe that the Iraq War justifies the cost. How do you expect to justify sort of the tough talk you give about Iran, especially in light of the NIE findings that they have suspended their nuclear weapons program."

McCain: "…I don't except that or believe it. In all due respect, ma'am, I know the military, I hear from them by the thousands, I know them. I just came back from spending Thanksgiving with them in Iraq. So, I categorically reject that assertion and I will not accept it…They know they're succeeding."

> Tory: "It was a poll that was taken."

McCain: "I don't care if it's a banana. I don't believe it. I know them too well. I've spent too many years in the military and associated with the military. We just have a disagreement with the poll…"

> Tory: "…The costs have been enormous…they don't believe the war is justified by the costs. How can you go about justifying the future cost of a war…I just don't understand."

McCain: "…Nobody hates war more than a veteran…But there are worse things than war, unfortunately, and we found that out with the rise of Hitler and we found out in other times in history that there are times when tragically it is a necessary action we take. But no one understands better than a veteran."

some interrogation tapes of interrogations of some al Qaeda people… bad people, bad, bad people. But they decided against the recommendation of members of Congress, and, uh, a lot of other people and organizations not to erase those tapes. What does that do? That confirms suspicions of people who are our enemies that, that we, that we engage in interrogation techniques which are illegal, it causes, uh, others to be encouraged, and it erodes the credibility and confidence of the American people in their government. And I'll tell ya, as president of the United States, we will never torture another person in the custody of the United States of America. Question: Sen. Biden called for a special counsel to investigate the destruction of the two CIA tapes. Do you think it's an appropriate measure?

On his experience and National Security:

"My friends I've had the experience, I've had the knowledge and the background that I have the judgement to handle these challenges to national security. Unlike 2000, we are in two wars. Unlike 2000, we have had an attack on the United States of America that killed more than 3000 of our innocent civilians. Unlike 2000, we are facing this challenge of radical Islamic extremism, which will be with us for a long time. I think I'm prepared to beat it. [...] In the toughest times when I supported the surge, Sen. John Edwards called it 'the McCain surge.' 'McCain strategy.' He doesn't say that anymore, but he used to. A lot of political pundits are saying that 'John McCain's political ambitions are at an end.' I will tell you right now that I'd rather lose a campaign than I would lose a war."

McCain Squirms on Birth Control Question (Wall Street Journal 7/9/08)

While John McCain often embodies an anything-goes attitude when talking to reporters, it doesn't mean some subjects can't make him sweat—say, birth control. A female Los Angeles Times reporter inquired today about comments made earlier this week by McCain campaign adviser Carly Fiorina, the former head of Hewlett Packard.

No G(r)8 Accomplishment (Washington Post 7/10/08)
President Bush's agreement to a declaration on climate change comes seven years late. THE GROUP of Eight declaration of its commitment to a goal of reducing greenhouse gas emissions by 50 percent by 2050 could be viewed as a ho-hum event when you consider that German Chancellor Angela Merkel sought the same commitment at last year's summit and that the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has called for a cut of up to 80 percent in the same period.

If you ever want to know whether someone is really a Democrat or a Republican at heart, just ask them what they think about the '60s. As Bill Clinton, the shrewdest of all judges when it came to divining voters' subconscious political loyalties, memorably put it: "If you look back on the '60s and think there was more good than harm, you're probably a Democrat. Subject: Iran statement

HRC has signed off on the statement below and asks if she should tweet as well. Anyone have any concerns?

The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It is also vital that our efforts to deny Iran a nuclear weapon be part of a comprehensive strategy to check its regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

“They Can Live in the Desert but Nowhere Else: A History of the Armenian Genocide"

Starting in early 1915, the Ottoman Turks began deporting and killing hundreds of thousands of Armenians in the first major genocide of the twentieth century. By the end of the First World War, the number of Armenians in what would become Turkey had been reduced by ninety percent—more than a million people. A century later, the Armenian Genocide remains controversial but relatively unknown, overshadowed by later slaughters and the chasm separating Turkish and Armenian versions of events. In this definitive narrative history, Ronald Suny cuts through nationalist myths, propaganda, and denial to provide an unmatched account of when, how, and why the atrocities of 1915–1916 were committed.

Drawing on archival documents and eyewitness accounts, Professor Suny's book is a vivid and unforgettable chronicle of a cataclysm that set a tragic pattern for a century of genocide and crimes against humanity.

Workers to Directly Question McCain on New Website

Online Video Series to Showcase Controversial McCain Agenda through Parody

WASHINGTON, D.C. – A new campaign by the seven unions and six million members of Change to Win is telling working families about John McCain's anti-worker agenda.

In a multifaceted, multimedia effort, Change to Win is launching a McCain Truth Squad tour; starting a new website, www.worsethanbush.org , that allows workers to directly question McCain and his agenda; and premiering after Labor Day a two-part online comedy video series showcasing McCain's anti-worker policies through humor.

The Squad of 9 workers starts its journey today in Nevada and will travel through three states using direct action and creative events to educate members on controversial McCain positions on America's mortgage crisis, Yucca Mountain, Nevada Governor Jim Gibbons and McCain's own negligence in the Senate.

"It's time for some truth about who John McCain really is and what a McCain presidency would mean for America's workers," said Anna Burger, chair of Change to Win. "Change to Win's Truth Squad is standing up to John McCain's campaign of distortion, which disguises a Bush-inspired agenda that will bankrupt our economy for four more years. At the same time, the Squad is standing up for Barack Obama whose presidency will help build a new American Dream for working families by delivering the change our members desperately need on the issues that matter most – the economy and jobs, health care and workers' rights."

The Change to Win Truth Squad is comprised of workers from Nevada, Illinois and Florida, including waitresses, cashiers, dishwashers, homecare workers and government employees. The Squad will highlight McCain's agenda through dramatic demonstrations such as:

- Foreclosure funerals in Reno and Las Vegas: These memorials symbolize the disastrous effect the mortgage crisis has had on Nevada and the completely inadequate response of John McCain. The events will feature speeches by workers who have lost their home, a coffin filled with mortgage statements and workers dressed up as the "McCain Mortgage Reapers." The Foreclosure Funerals will take place at Washoe County Republican Party headquarters and John McCain's Nevada campaign headquarters.

- Jim Gibbons Rally in Carson City: John McCain has called Nevada Governor Jim Gibbons a "Great Governor" despite an FBI investigation into Gibbons' congressional past, allegations that he got his property taxes lowered from $5,000 to $15 and using a state cell phone to text his mistress 860 times. The Squad will highlight McCain's dedication to the embattled governor with a mock rally at the Nevada State capital featuring the "True McCain" explaining his support for Jim Gibbons based on their united anti-worker agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Yucca Mountain Disaster Prep in Pahrump: To highlight John McCain's strong support of storing nuclear waste in Yucca Mountain, the Squad will hold a disaster preparation rally. The event will feature the "Truth McCain" demonstrating procedures and outfits workers will need to use on the job in the event of a nuclear spill to prevent side effects such as cancer and radiation poisoning.

The Squad's mission is also spread online through www.worsethanbush.org . A main feature of the site is called "Ask McCain" – videos of workers across the country telling their stories of what life has been like over the last seven years and asking John McCain questions about his record and agenda. In addition, www.worsethanbush.org is a hub for videos featuring candid and entertaining McCain moments, up-to-date news on McCain flaps, and "Who Said It?," an interactive game featuring prominent, and comic, McCain quotes.

The website will also host an online comedy video series highlighting through parody the consequences of McCain's agenda for working families. The videos will be produced by Olde English, a New York-based comedy group formerly of Turner's SuperDeluxe.com and featured monthly at the Upright Citizens Brigade Theater.

The following is the schedule for the Truth Squad's three tours:

Tour 1	Tour 2	Tour 3
8.18 - Reno, NV	9.5 - St. Paul, MN	9.26 - Grand Rapids, MI
8.19 - Carson City, NV	9.6 - La Crosse, WI	9.27 - Lansing, MI
8.20 - Las Vegas, NV	9.7 - Cedar Rapids, IA	9.28 - Detroit, MI
8.21 - Pahrump, NV	9.9 - Kansas City, MO	9.29 - Toledo, OH
8.22 - Phoenix, AZ	9.11 - St. Louis, MO	9.30 - Cleveland, OH
8.24 - Denver, CO	9.5 - St. Paul, MN	10.1 – Pittsburgh, PA
		10.3 – Scranton, PA

On February 21, 2008, Change to Win endorsed Senator Barack Obama for president of the United States of America. The Change to Win political program is conducting a comprehensive mail, phone and canvass effort in 13 battleground states: Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Iowa, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nevada, Colorado, Michigan, Indiana, North Carolina and Virginia. Change to Win plans to send 10 million pieces of direct mail, make 20 million phone calls, and run a full-time, coordinated member-to-member canvass with 1,500 member organizers. Change to Win unions also plan to recruit over 50,000 volunteers for Election Day.

With the Minsk II ceasefire in eastern Ukraine looking increasingly shaky, Europe risks a frozen conflict for years to come. However, is Russian President Vladimir Putin finished in Ukraine? Can the United States and Europe expect more aggression from the Kremlin or is consolidation Russia's strategy now? What do the future of Russian relations with the European Union and Germany look like and what role do sanctions play in this calculation? Elmar Brok, chairman of the European Parliament's Committee on Foreign Affairs, wil answer these questions and provide analysis of U.S.-European views toward Ukraine and Russia. GMF, the Konrad Adenauer Foundation, and the European Parliament Liaison Office are pleased to jointly host this conversation.

Elmar Brok is the chairman of the European Parliament's Committee on Foreign Affairs (AFET). A member of the European Parliament since 1980, Brok is also a member of the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, the Conference of Committee Chairs, a member of the Delegation for Relations with India, a deputy member of the Delegation for Relations with the United States, and a co-chairman of the Transatlantic Legislator's Dialogue. A German Christian Democrat, Brok is the spokesman on external affairs for the European Parliament's Group of the European People's Party (EPP) and a member of the Federal Committee of the German Christian Democratic Union (CDU). Brok has received the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany and was recognized as "Commander of the Gregorius-Order" by Pope John Paul II in 2002.

Dr. Stephen F. Szabo is the executive director of the Transatlantic Academy (TA). As executive director, he works with the partners of the TA to shape the research content of each term, to assist in the recruitment and selection of Fellows and to manage the Academy. Prior to joining GMF, Szabo had been with the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University, where he served as academic and interim dean as well as professor of European studies. Prior to that, he had served as professor of National Security Affairs at the National Defense University and chairman of west European studies at the Foreign Service Institute, U.S. Department of State. Dear Mr. Bowles,

My latest piece in The Weekly Standard, co-authored with Max Boot, argues that a Trump presidency would undermine the liberal international order which the United States painstakingly constructed and cultivated after the Second World War. This would, we believe, gravely damage America's security and standing in the world.

I hope you find the piece of interest.

All best regards,

Benn Steil

Selling America Short

Max Boot and Benn Steil
The Weekly Standard
February 26, 2016

Following his primary victories in New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, Donald Trump has established himself as the clear frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination. He has done so offering grandiose slogans — He'll Make America Great Again! He'll have us win so much we'll get bored with winning! — and precious little in specifics. He has said, for example, that he would repeal Obamacare, without saying a word about what would replace it — beyond promising that his health program would be "terrific" and "take care of everyone."

When Trump does offer specifics, more often than not they are impossible to implement. Recently, for example, he said that he would solve the North Korea nuclear problem by getting China to assassinate Kim Jong-un. Given that China's leaders are unwilling to sanction North Korea, it is exceedingly unlikely they will murder its leader at President Trump's request.

In short, Trump has redefined the Art of the Deal in American politics: His promises would make even the most cynical political veteran blush. It is hard to know whether Trump is serious about what he says, given his ever-shifting views, lack of policy advisers, and claims that he would behave differently in office than on the campaign trail. Nevertheless, with the populist billionaire continuing to ride high, it is important to take him seriously as a potential occupant of the Oval Office. What would a President Trump do, and what would be the likely consequences of his actions?

Start with trade policy, the area that, along with immigration, seems to exercise him the most. One of America's greatest accomplishments in the early postwar era was the creation of a rules-based international trade regime. The aim was to prevent a recurrence of the trade wars of the early 1930s, which spread the Great Depression globally and helped fuel the rise of both fascist and Communist movements around the world.

Governments stuck by this trade regime even through the recent financial crisis and recession. Trump, however, says he is prepared to abrogate America's commitments, citing nothing more than the pretense that our importing more than we export is evidence of "cheating" by foreign governments. He has pledged to slap an illegal 35 percent tariff on U.S. automakers that manufacture vehicles in Mexico. If Mexico refuses to accept his as-yet unspecified demands to change the terms of the North America Free Trade Agreement, he has pledged that "we will break it." Such a trade war with America's third-largest trade partner would raise prices and kill jobs on both sides of the border, no doubt prompting new waves of the illegal immigration that Trump has pledged to end.

As for the recently concluded 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership deal, not yet ratified by Congress, Trump has condemned it. He argues that TPP will benefit "big corporations in America" and China, which is doubly bizarre. Companies with over 500 employees account for half of U.S. employment and two-thirds of U.S. exports. Does Trump then seek trade deals in which mom-and-pop shops will somehow drive exports? As for China, it is not part of the deal and has in fact signaled "countermeasures" to offset the impact of its exclusion.

Trump has pledged to brand China a currency manipulator for pushing down its currency as a means of gaining trade advantages. In retaliation Trump has threatened a 45 percent tariff on Chinese goods — which will surely open a second front in the trade war, this time with America's second-largest trading partner.

Yet even ignoring that the International Monetary Fund declared China's currency "fairly valued" last May, its central bank has lately been intervening to push its currency up — not down. China's foreign currency reserves have fallen $760 billion from their 2014 peak and $300 billion in just the past three months. At this rate of decline, it will actually face a dangerous shortage of reserves by the spring. To start a trade war with China while it is helping, rather than hurting, U.S. exporters is not only reckless but crazed.

On immigration, Trump has famously called for the roundup and deportation of the roughly 11 million undocumented immigrants living in the United States. He claims he can accomplish this in 18 months. According to the center-right American Action Forum, this would actually take about 20 years to accomplish and cost U.S. taxpayers between $400 billion and $600 billion. The impact on the U.S. economy would be considerably larger: Gross domestic product would fall by nearly $1.6 trillion, not only because of enforcement costs but because of the disruptive impact of removing 11 million people from the workforce. Industries such as agriculture that rely on immigrant labor would be hardest hit: Farm income would decline; food prices would increase. Businesses in urban areas, where many immigrants live and work, also would suffer from a sharp fall in customers, while consumers would suffer an increase in the cost of everyday services.

To prevent a future immigrant influx, Trump would construct a 1,000-mile wall on the Mexican border; he claims this will cost $8 billion, but more credible estimates suggest it will be over $40 billion. This, he says, Mexico will finance because "you tell them they're gonna pay for it." This strategy failed signally for Trump's creditors when his businesses declared bankruptcy four times, refusing to pay their debts; how it would succeed in Mexico's case remains a mystery.

Trump assures us Mexico can afford the wall, whose cost would amount to 3 percent of its annual GDP ($1.2 trillion), because of its trade surplus with the United States. Yet a surplus is a claim on future U.S. goods and services; it gives America goods and services for which we do not immediately provide any in return. It is manifestly not a windfall. It is a safe bet that no Mexican government could possibly give in to his demands and, if it did, it would not stay in power for long.

Trump would be no more successful in pursuing his stated strategy for the Middle East. Instead of trying to end the Syrian civil war, he suggests we should "make something with Russia" — that is, support its military intervention in Syria. This is of a piece with his admiration for Russian strongman Vladimir Putin, whom he has praised as a real "leader, unlike what we have in this country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One problem with this is that only 10 percent of Russia's munitions in Syria are directed at America's enemy, ISIS. The other 90 percent are being dropped on moderate opposition groups supported by the United States. Putin's objective is to shore up the Bashar al-Assad regime in cooperation with Assad's backers in Iran. But as long as Assad continues to commit war crimes against the majority Sunni population, ISIS and other extremist Sunni groups, such as the Nusra Front, will continue to attract support from Sunnis.

There is also the troubling fact that Russia is aiding and abetting Assad's war crimes — troubling to everyone but Donald Trump. He has pledged to commit war crimes of his own by going "beyond waterboarding" in his treatment of captured terrorist suspects, even if brutal interrogation techniques don't elicit any new information. "They deserve it anyway for what they do to us," he says. He also threatens to target families of terrorists and to "bomb the shit" out of areas held by ISIS. More recently he has spoken admiringly of shooting Muslim prisoners of war with bullets dipped in pig's blood — a practice he erroneously attributes to Gen. John J. Pershing during his service in the Philippines.

If Trump were to order the U.S. military to act as he suggests, the likely result would be a crisis in civil-military relations. Many military personnel would refuse to carry out orders so blatantly at odds with the laws of war; soldiers know that they could face prosecution under a future administration. If soldiers were to do as President Trump ordered, moreover, terrorist organizations would have a new recruiting pitch with the world's Muslims — the need to counter American barbarism.

The anti-American backlash would grow greater still if Trump carried out his threat to ban Muslims from entering the United States and to seize Syrian or Iraqi oil fields — an undertaking that would require a long-term American military occupation. Such actions would alienate allies that the United States needs to fight terror and would risk driving a substantial minority of American Muslims toward extremist views in a way that both Presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama carefully avoided doing.

Trump would also alienate America's oldest allies in Europe and Asia if he carried through on his repeated threats to renegotiate or terminate the agreements under which U.S. troops have been based abroad for decades. Trump has promised to tear up the 1960 U.S.-Japan Treaty, saying, "If somebody attacks Japan, we have to immediately go and start World War III, okay? If we get attacked, Japan doesn't have to help us. Somehow that doesn't sound so fair."

He has been equally acerbic in criticizing South Korea, saying, "We have 28,000 soldiers on the line in South Korea between the madman [Kim Jong-un] and them. We get practically nothing compared to the cost of this." In fact South Korea pays more than $800 million annually to support U.S. troops on the peninsula, making it arguably cheaper to keep U.S. forces there than on the American mainland. Japan also contributes to the upkeep of U.S. forces based there. In return the United States maintains the security of America's fourth-largest and sixth-largest trade partners, while preventing a nuclear arms race in Asia. Japan and South Korea, if stripped of American protection, would almost surely go nuclear. Indeed, Trump's incendiary rhetoric is already leading more South Koreans to argue that their nation should acquire its own nuclear arsenal.

Trump has spoken in similarly contemptuous tones of America's European allies, who, in his view, are also giving American taxpayers a raw deal. He says that in combating Russian aggression, the Europeans should take the lead. "You know the old expression," he says, " 'Go on fellows. I'm right behind you'?" And he adds indignantly: "Why are we always at the forefront of everything?" At the same time, Trump has said he would get along "fine" with Russia. This suggests that he would undo the role that the United States has played in defending Europe against Russian aggression since 1949 and might even tilt U.S. policy in a pro-Russian direction. Since Putin has called the collapse of the Soviet Union the "greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the [20th] century," Eastern Europe will surely tremble while waiting to see how much of it will have to be restored as the cost of the blossoming Trump-Putin "bromance."

The radical changes that Trump proposes are all the more dangerous because he is so singularly ill-equipped to manage the resulting turmoil. This is a candidate, after all, who doesn't know the difference between the Kurds and the Quds Force or have any idea what the "nuclear triad" is. Nor has Trump so far made good on his pledge to attract "top top people" to help him run things; he has still not unveiled a campaign foreign policy team in spite of months of pledges to do so. In any case, advisers cannot make up for a president's ignorance and prejudice; presidents always get conflicting advice, and it is their job, and their job alone, to make the most difficult judgment calls in the world.

Trump has already done considerable damage to America's reputation with his crude, bombastic, and often ugly rhetoric. American standing, as measured both in "soft power" and more traditional realpolitik terms, would suffer far more if he were to become commander in chief. A Trump presidency threatens the post-World War II liberal international order that American presidents of both parties have so laboriously built up — an order based on free trade and alliances with other democracies.

His policies would not make America "great." Just the opposite. A Trump presidency would represent the death knell of America as a great power.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/18/08

Main Topics: McCain surrogates attack Obama trip, McCain doesn't know if Obama is a Socialist

Summary: Media excitement revolving around Obama's trip to Europe, Afghanistan and Iraq led the news today. Although anchors were quick to repeat GOP talking points of Obama's travel as being part 'political' and occurring too late, several outlets still noted the contradictory criticisms emanating from the McCain campaign on this issue. There were mentions of McCain's rebuke of Jill Hazelbaker's photo-op comment from yesterday. Top McCain surrogates Tim Pawlenty and Mitt Romney gave interviews this morning, both faithfully delivering the message that Obama is campaigning for the "President of Europe" and that the entire trip to the Middle East is more about politics than policy. Political-related news touched on an EPA report about climate change and health concerns, Bill Clinton's willingness to campaign for Obama, Al Gore's environmental speech on Thursday, new Republican smears against Michelle Obama, and an interview Speaker Pelosi gave to Wolf Blitzer attacking President Bush. Segments about the release of the new Batman movie, an increase in travel costs, an apparent parachute mishap, and a missing child story, were on constant rotation throughout the day.

Highlights:
1. MSNBC: Pawlenty disparages Obama for speaking in Europe, campaigning for "President of Europe"
2. NBC: Romney similarly attacks Obama, also saying Obama should have proposed policy after fact-finding trip rather than before
3. ABC: Tapper analyzes McCain position on Obama trip
4. CNN: Hosts discuss McCain town hall, conflicting messages from McCain camp regarding Obama's travels
5. CNN: McCain campaign dumps oppo research and 8 minute video file to reporters in attempt to reframe Obama foreign policy position

7. MSNBC: Jim Warren of the Chicago Tribune calls Cindy McCain 'stolid,' an 'ice queen'
8. MSNBC: Morning Joe pundits discuss Hazelbaker comments, blame 24/7 news cycle yet note conflicting message coming from McCain campaign

Pawlenty Says Obama Is Campaigning For 'President of Europe' (MSNBC 07/18/08)
MIKE BARNICLE: The Obama trip to Iraq, Afghanistan, overseas. How many trips to Iraq have you taken?
TIM PAWLENTY: I've taken three Mike and the last one was last year. I'm glad, we're glad the McCain campaign said Senator Obama is finally getting back to Iraq. He's only been there once. He hasn't been there almost three years. If you're going to make pronouncements about war, be helpful if you had some on the ground experience. So we applaud his decision to go. And we applaud his decision to migrate more towards McCain's position on these issues. But I am concerned about the unprecedented political rallies he's going to be having across Europe. It's one thing to meet with world leaders. It's another thing to be basically campaigning for President of Europe, it seems. And that's a little unprecedented and concerning if he's going to be having political rallies.
BARNICLE: Aren't you encouraged though? Everything, all the reporting says that in the papers are that Europeans are down on America because of Iraq and they don't like the Bush administration. So this might be some element of the United States of America might like? That's kind of encouraging don't you think?
PAWLENTY: Well again I segregate the trip. I applaud the Iraq and Afghanistan trip but I don't think he's ever by the way set foot in Afghanistan even though he's making pronouncements about the war. But going to Europe and meeting with those leaders and introducing himself, trying to build good relations, that's positive. But it looks like he's planning what looks like political rallies in Europe. And I think that's unprecedented and to me it seems a little untoward.
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Ok let me try to give you the other side of that. And that is that one could argue that we are at a time, a moment in history where some feel that our international reputation is at stake. And perhaps Barack Obama is going there to build on not only his foreign policy credentials but also work on something that has

PAWLENTY: And I think that's good in that you saw Senator McCain go to Colombia for example. He met with President Uribe, he met with the Defense Sec. Santos, others at high level official meetings. He didn't go out and have rallies and politicize the trip in Colombia, or in Canada. He kept it in the context of formal policy speeches or meeting with officials. This trip seems designed to have kind of a political rally or campaign rally component to it. If you're a sitting President that would be good or a sitting official but it seems a little bit odd if your in the middle of a Presidential campaign that he'd be having these political rallies on this trip.
BARNICLE: What's odd about it? The guys a politician. You're a politician. I mean if you were given the opportunity, I mean if somebody said to you we're the government of Germany we'd like you to stand up and speak before 4,000 people or how many people, what would you say? No I don't want to do it because I'm the Gov of Minnesota and I don't want to speak when I'm overseas. It's odd. This complaint seems odd.
PAWLENTY: Well I think it's a question of is it political or is it policy? He's a sitting Senator and in that capacity the right and opportunity to go and deal with those kinds of issues or have those kinds of meetings but are those things really designed to advance a policy discussion and the United States national security interests which we try not to politicize as officials? Or is it designed to be part of his campaign? And if it's part of his campaign, campaigning in Europe, seems to be perhaps unusual or unprecedented at least in my knowledge about Presidential campaigning.

Romney Attacks Obama's Trip As 'Campaign Swing,' Distances Himself From Past Criticism of McCain
MITT ROMNEY: As a campaign swing more than a fact-finding tour, it's unfortunate that he developed this policy with regards to the surge before he was actually there 20 see how the surge might be progressing. As a matter of fact, had he been president a year ago he would have said no to the surge, pulled out our troops and we would be in a setting where al qaeda would be planning attacks against us from Iraq. We're fortunate he wasn't president and not doing this tour at a time when it could have shaped his policy with regards to iraq and foreign policy. [...]

ROMNEY: I'm sure he'll be warmly received. People of different political backgrounds are warmly received there. I don't know whether he'll be able to erase the things he's already said. My guess is he'll say don't confuse me with the facts. My mind is already made up. He's already said what he'd do without the benefit of speaking to General Petraeus and leaders on the ground there. John McCain is saying, look, his goal get the troops out by the end of his first term. They're in a combat setting, and get that done but not going to do it based upon some artificial political timetable.

MATT LAUER: [...] Primary races, of course, good news you get to run for president. Bad news, everything you say during that primary race comes back to haunt you in some caes. Here what you said, quote, in January, 'I frankly don't think Senator McCain despite his service and length of experience will be able to stand up to the message that Barack Obama has brought forward. I think Barack Obama would be able to do the John McCain exactly what he was able to do to other senators who are running on the democratic side.' So if that's what you said in January, why do you think John McCain's now the man?

ROMNEY: Well, no question when it comes to Barack Obama you've got a charming person, well spoken. He speaks beautifully. But i think in the final analysis that the sweet talk is going to give way to straight talk. [...] Barack is very tough. No question about that. When I was running in the primary I thought i was the right guy to run against Barack Obama. When it comes to comparison between John McCain and Barack Obama I know who I'd pick, who America should choose and in the final analysis will choose the guy that's been there, has the experience, demonstrated right on the surge, author of it, his work.

LAUER: They worry about John McCain and the economy. Six in ten a poll feel that John McCain will continue basically the policies of our current president George Bush. 54% to 35% in a Washington Post abc poll think Barack Obama will best handle the economy. With the economy being the biggest issue on the minds of voters, that's got to be a real problem for John McCain. Doesn't it?

ROMNEY: It's a big opportunity for John McCain. As they understand Barack Obama's position, the John McCain position, the American people will say, guess what? John McCain is right on the economy. Barack Obama is wrong. Raising taxes, as Barack Obama would do would slow down the economy. He's admitted that as much. His energy policy is critical to the economy. Barack Obama doesn't want additional drilling or nuclear power plants fast tracked, wants to put higher tax on coal and John McCain will bring the cost of energy down. that's the right policy.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: The McCain campaign is very frustrated by this. As you know, All three evening news anchors going over on this foreign soil with Barack Obama. CNN Previews McCain's MI Town Hall, Discusses His Position Having "Goaded" Obama Into Iraq/ Afghanistan Trip (CNN 06/18/08 9:00am)
TONY HARRIS: Michigan is one of the hardest hit states economically. I'm wondering what John McCain's message is today.

DANA BASH: It's going to be talking about exactly that. […] that is going to be a big part of John McCain's message there that he has been trying to give across the country on this stump talking a lot about the economy and the fact that he understands people are hurting. But what he's going to do at this particular event is try to shine a light on some new technology that he says he hopes will be the wave of the future and perhaps a jobs gainer in the future. He's going to be touring this plant where they're hoping to and trying to devise the first plug in electric car. It's called the Chevy Volt. So you are going to hear some of the 'I feel your pain' message from John McCain but also a try to focus on some of the technologies that he says he hopes can be developed for in the future.

HARRIS: Hey Dana you know we've heard John McCain crticize Barack Obama's upcoming overseas trip. Are we likely to hear more of that today?

BASH: We are. […] in the words of one adviser it is extraordinarily arrogant for him to be explaining his policies, his foreign policies on Afghanistan on Iraq which he did this week before even going. You heard John McCain yesterday say that from his experience, he's travel abroad extensively, he waits until he comes home from a fact finding mission to announce his policies. There they feel that they have a little bit of an edge on something they know Tony they know full well that this trip is going to get extensive, extensive coverage. They're trying to influence it as much they can.

HARRIS: And remind us: this is a trip McCain suggested Obama should take, correct?

BASH: Exactly. Pretty much goaded him into it. He talked about over and over counting the days Obama had not been in Iraq and of course he's never been to Afghanistan.

Stewart Skewers McCain's NAACP address, 'What Else Do You Have In Your Pander Box?' (COMEDY 07/17/08)
STEWART: What else do you have in your pander box?
JOHN MCCAIN (CLIP): Martin Luther King who often reminded us there's no moral badness and there was moral blindness. It was this spirit that turned hatred into forgiveness, anger into conviction, and a bitter life into a great one.
STEWART: And that is why I, John McCain, voted fought so hard so long to prevent to prevent his birthday from becoming a national holiday. Well into the 1980's long after most of my likeminded colleagues had given up fighting that. That's why when it was passed into law I supported the drive to prevent its observation in my home state of Arizona.

Highlight #10
McCain Says He "Do[es]n't Know" If Obama Is a Socialist, Answers Questions about Gas Tax Holiday, Immigration and Flip-Floppping on Tax Cuts (Kansas City Star taped interview 07/17/08)
INTERVIEWER: Your opponent raised $52million dollars. [...] That shows he has a lot of support it seems.

JOHN MCCAIN: Well we have never raised more money than our opponents in the primary and other races. Now we have more than enough money to do the things we need to do, to buy the media we need to buy[...] We're gonna get $85 million in public financing. And Senator Obama, after he had pledged to take public financing as well if I did obviously went back on his word.
INTERVIEWER: You talked about a gas tax holiday[...] You said it would be brief. [...] How long would it be?

MCCAIN: …It depends on the economy, it depends on a lot of things. [...] I was at a big trucking company yesterday; they said we could save $40 million a year. …

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERVIEWER: A lot of experts this is just not a good idea.

MCCAIN: A lot of experts are driven to work in chauffeured limousines. A lot of experts live in Georgetown and walk to work. These are the lower-income Americans that are being hurt by it.

INTERVIEWER: You're saying it could last for... a summer?

MCCAIN: We'd have to see. But let's declare it and see what happens. And […] you want to spend their gas-tax dollars on $233million bridge in Alaska to an island with 50 people on it, or do you wanna let people have a little relief? The most pork-barrel laden aspect of all the everything we do are the highway bills.

INTERVIEWER: Kit Bond might have some problems with that, as you know—

MCCAIN (interrupting): Senator Bond and I have strong disagreement […] on pork-barrel spending and we've fought on the floor of the Senate, and I think the American people are fed up with earmark pork-barrel spending […] They're sick of Washington and the ways they're doing things.

INTERVIEWER: […] T. Boone Pickens has suggested natural gas for cars, wind power. What do you think of his idea?

MCCAIN: I think it's a good idea. The only disagreement I have—I think we need nuclear […] and he agrees with that. We need wind, tide, solar […] I agree with that. All of these alternate forms of energy have to be (1) funded in pure research and development and second, see which one wins. Let 'em all loose. Unleash 'em all. And nuclear has to be part of any equation. Sen Obama opposes nuclear. Offshore drilling has to be part of it—he opposes offshore drilling.

INTERVIEWER: […] Been a little dustup here over a group called the Minutemen Civil Defense Fund. […] Are they a good thing? […] Do they help in the immigration fight or not?

MCCAIN: I think they are citizens who are […] entitled to being engaged in the process […] I don't agree with them but they certainly are exercising their legal rights as citizens.

INTERVIEWER: Finally, you talked a little bit about Senator Obama today. You said he was the most extreme member, I think.

MCCAIN: Yep, that's his voting record.

INTERVIEWER: […] Do you really think he's an extremist? I mean, he's clearly liberal, but—

MCCAIN: That's his voting record. All I said was his voting record, and that is more to the left than the announced Socialist in the United States Senate, Bernie Sanders of Vermont. So—

INTERVIEWER: Do you think he's a socialist—Barack Obama?

MCCAIN: Oh I don't know. All I know is his voting record. […] But I know this, too. Senator Obama has not done what I've done. He's not reached across the aisle […] I have. […] And finally, Senator Obama supported amendments that would've killed comprehensive immigration reform. Then he says that he's for immigration reform.

INTERVIEWER: But you flip-flop a little bit too…

MCCAIN: No, I didn't!

INTERVIEWER: You flip-flopped on drilling a little bit…

MCCAIN (interrupting_: Actually I didn't!

INTERVIEWER: …tax cuts…

MCCAIN: Actually, on the drilling issue—when gasoline reached $4 a gallon, we gotta do things that we otherwise have not done in the past. I have not changed my position on any other issue: On immigration […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERVIEWER: But you were against the tax cuts, now you're talking about making them permanent.

MCCAIN: I mean, isn't there flip-flopping on both sides, Senator?

INTERVIEWER: Actually no. actually, I had a tax cut proposal of my own—Senator Obama wants to raise taxes, I want to keep them low. […] I had a package of tax cuts and I said we had to restrain spending. […] We did not restrain spending, and that's why I voted—main reason why I voted against them. […] And I have voted for tax cuts in the past. And Sen Obama wants to raise them. So, I've heard a lot of this propaganda. And I understand what campaigns are about—all of the […] back-and-forth. But I'll stand on my record of bipartisan effectiveness for America […] as I did when I said that we had to send additional troops to Iraq. Sen Obama said it would fail […] We have succeeded in Iraq, and if we keep doing what we're doing, we'll win this war.

HOLDING: Mike Dorning again, new story: "Now more focused on the idea that Secretary Clinton hasn't yet signaled where she will be on the progressive v. Business/moderate internal debate within the party on where to go on economic policy/inequality."

Below is the list of briefings Jim and I propose we request of the IC and others for senior transition national security staff over the coming weeks.

A subset of these TBD could subsequently be requested for POTUS-E and VPOTUS-E. We leave it to others to decide if it is desirable and appropriate for POTUS-E to request any or all of these in his meeting with Bush on Monday).

Subject: Iran tonight

Here's where we've landed:

I want to start by saying something about one of the most serious decisions we face today as a nation – the Iranian nuclear agreement.

As Secretary of State, I traveled tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition against Iran and impose the most crippling sanctions in history. That pressure delivered a blow to Iran's economy and gave us the leverage necessary to get to the negotiating table and begin the first preliminary talks.

Now, thanks to President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Secretary Moniz, we have an agreement that blocks Iran's pathways to a bomb and gives us new tools for verification and inspection to compel rigorous Iranian compliance.

There are people of good faith on both sides of this debate, people who are committed to protecting our security and the security of our allies, especially Israel, a true friend of America.

None of us should have any illusions about Iran's true intentions or its continuing threat to Israel, the region, and the United States. That threat is real and it must be confronted, including how we enforce this agreement and deter Iranian aggression and sponsorship of terrorism.

But our path is clear. This agreement, combined with strong enforcement and deterrence, is the only way to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

There simply is no viable alternative.

That's why I strongly support President Obama. And I encourage all of you to get involved and let Congress know that you support the President as well.

And when this debate is over, we need to come together to ensure the President has the tools, resources, and support to send a clear message to Iran: Cheat, and you will pay. When you threaten Israel, you threaten America. And make no mistake, we will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement -- never.

Here is an excerpt and full text of interview
EXCERPT:

SPIEGEL: Would you hazard a prediction as to when most of the US troops will finally leave Iraq?

Maliki: As soon as possible, as far as we're concerned. US presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months. Assuming that positive developments continue, this is about the same time period that corresponds to our wishes.

SPIEGEL: Is this an endorsement for the US presidential election in November? Does Obama, who has no military background, ultimately have a better understanding of Iraq than war hero John McCain?

Maliki: Those who operate on the premise of short time periods in Iraq today are being more realistic. Artificially prolonging the tenure of US troops in Iraq would cause problems. Of course, this is by no means an election endorsement. Who they choose as their president is the Americans' business. But it's the business of Iraqis to say what they want. And that's where the people and the government are in general agreement: The tenure of the coalition troops in Iraq should be limited.

FULLL TEXT OF INTERVIEW:

SPIEGEL: Germany was opposed to the war. The German economics minister was in Baghdad last week, Daimler AG plans to build trucks in Iraq, and you will travel to Berlin this week. Has everything been smoothed out between Germany and Iraq?

Maliki: We want closer relations, and it is my impression that the Germans -- the government, the people and German companies -- want the same thing. Our task is to rebuild a country, and the Germans are famous for effective and efficient work. We have great confidence in them and want to involve them in the development of our country.

SPIEGEL: And there is truly no resentment against a country that opposed the war in 2003?

Maliki: We do not judge our partners on the basis of whether or not they were militarily involved in toppling Saddam. The decisions back then corresponded to the national will of the countries, and we respect that.

SPIEGEL: What exactly do you expect from the Germans and from German companies?

Maliki: We want to get to know them, and we want to know what they want -- and the things they fear when thinking about Iraq. We have to start over again in many areas, including oil production, the development of the power grid and all industries. There is much to be done.

SPIEGEL: What do you expect from the Germans, politically and militarily? The Bundeswehr (German Armed Forces) occasionally trains Iraqi security forces -- but only in neighboring countries.

Maliki: What matters most to us is that we develop resilient political relationships and work together economically. Our security forces are steadily improving, partly as a result of German efforts. We will be pleased to turn to the Germans to equip our police and military; and should there be new training programs with the German Bundeswehr, we will be happy to accept their help. However, we would clearly prefer that the training take place in Iraq in the future. Overall, I believe that we are gradually becoming self-sufficient.

SPIEGEL: Three weeks ago, your government filed a civil lawsuit in New York against companies that allegedly paid bribes to officials in the Saddam regime. The defendants include three German companies: Daimler,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Siemens and B. Braun Melsungen. How is this compatible with your overtures to German industry?

Maliki: We are in negotiations with Siemens for the construction of power plants, which shows just how serious we are. Whether the suit you mention succeeds will be for the courts to decide. Under no circumstances will the consequence be that we no longer wish to work with the companies in question.

SPIEGEL: Large parts of Iraq's assets abroad remain frozen -- and inaccessible to creditors. What will happen to this money when the UN Security Council mandate for Iraq expires at the end of this year?

Maliki: We have hired several international law firms to deal with these assets. At the moment, they are protected by UN resolutions, American law and the personal commitment of President George W. Bush -- and we want this protection to remain in place after the end of UN mandate on Iraq. We consider the claims being lodged against this money to be unjustified. Iraq cannot be punished for crimes that were committed by the dictator. This is very important to us, and a key aspect of our negotiations over the future status of US troops in Iraq.

SPIEGEL: Germany, after World War II, was also liberated from a tyrant by a US-led coalition. That was 63 years ago, and today there are still American military bases and soldiers in Germany. How do you feel about this model?

Maliki: Iraq can learn from Germany's experiences, but the situation is not truly comparable. Back then Germany waged a war that changed the world. Today, we in Iraq want to establish a timeframe for the withdrawal of international troops -- and it should be short. At the same time, we would like to see the establishment of a long-term strategic treaty with the United States, which would govern the basic aspects of our economic and cultural relations. However, I wish to re-emphasize that our security agreement should remain in effect in the short term.

SPIEGEL: How short-term? Are you hoping for a new agreement before the end of the Bush administration?

Maliki: So far the Americans have had trouble agreeing to a concrete timetable for withdrawal, because they feel it would appear tantamount to an admission of defeat. But that isn't the case at all. If we come to an agreement, it is not evidence of a defeat, but of a victory, of a severe blow we have inflicted on al-Qaida and the militias. The American lead negotiators realize this now, and that's why I expect to see an agreement taking shape even before the end of President Bush's term in office. With these negotiations, we will start the whole thing over again, on a clearer, better basis, because the first proposals were unacceptable to us.

SPIEGEL: Immunity for the US troops is apparently the central issue.

Maliki: It is a fundamental problem for us that it should not be possible, in my country, to prosecute offences or crimes committed by US soldiers against our population. But other issues are no less important: How much longer will these soldiers remain in our country? How much authority do they have? Who controls how many, soldiers enter and leave the country and where they do so?

SPIEGEL: Would you hazard a prediction as to when most of the US troops will finally leave Iraq?

Maliki: As soon as possible, as far as we're concerned. US presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months. Assuming that positive developments continue, this is about the same time period that corresponds to our wishes.

SPIEGEL: Is this an endorsement for the US presidential election in November? Does Obama, who has no military background, ultimately have a better understanding of Iraq than war hero John McCain?

Maliki: Those who operate on the premise of short time periods in Iraq today are being more realistic. Artificially prolonging the tenure of US troops in Iraq would cause problems. Of course, this is by no means an election endorsement. Who they choose as their president is the Americans' business. But it's the business of Iraqis to say what they want. And that's where the people and the government are in general agreement: The tenure of the coalition troops in Iraq should be limited.

SPIEGEL: In your opinion, which factor has contributed most to bringing calm to the situation in the country?

Maliki: There are many factors, but I see them in the following order. First, there is the political rapprochement we have managed to achieve in central Iraq. This has enabled us, above all, to pull the plug on al-Qaida. Second, there is the progress being made by our security forces. Third, there is the deep sense of abhorrence with which the population has reacted to the atrocities of al-Qaida and the militias. Finally, of course, there is the economic recovery.

SPIEGEL: Critics have accused you of striking harshly against the Mahdi army of Shiite leader Muqtada al-Sadr, while going easy on his rival Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim's Badr militia.

Maliki: That's not true. We proceed just as firmly against anyone who breaks the law. Just a few days ago, we had an incident with a group associated with the Badr people. The army moved in immediately and arrested them all. No one was spared. The punishment is based purely on the nature of the crime, not on the identity of the criminal.

SPIEGEL: In southern Iraq, where you come from, you have been compared with Saddam Hussein when it comes to harshness.

Maliki: That's the sort of thing that people say who don't understand how urgently Iraq needs stability -- or these people prefer instability. We don't want to spread fear and terror in Iraq. We have, for example, given the militias several deadlines to hand over their weapons. Their resistance was tremendous, so we had to oppose them with tremendous force of our own.

SPIEGEL: What role do you envision for your chief rival, Muqtada al-Sadr? Can there ever be national reconciliation in Iraq without his participation?

Maliki: You can only reconcile with someone who wants to reconcile. His Excellency Muqtada al-Sadr can be a political partner, especially if, to that end, he draws on the great spiritual legacy he has inherited from his ancestors. He has understood that his following was eventually infiltrated by criminal elements, by men from the former regime, al-Qaida people and others. The fact that he is now in the process of systematically separating himself from these elements makes him even stronger as a political partner. As a politician, I might add, not as a militia leader.

SPIEGEL: You spent part of your exile in Iran, and you have visited the country several times since you took office. Can you explain to us what the leaders in Tehran are up to? Are they building a nuclear bomb? Do you see this as a serious threat?

Maliki: I have not been made privy to the details of the Iranian nuclear program. Iranian representatives assure us, however, that this program serves peaceful purposes. Even if Tehran wanted to develop a nuclear weapon, it would take a very long time, simply from a technical standpoint. It is obvious that our region is far too fragile for even a single country to possess nuclear weapons, because it will always be an incentive for other countries to also build their own.

SPIEGEL: Exactly 50 years ago, the monarchy in Iraq was overthrown and a republic established. But we didn't see any celebration of this event at all. What does that day mean for the history of Iraq?

Maliki: There may have been people who celebrated. But certainly not all Iraqis. On July 14, 1958, and era came to an end, but what came afterwards didn't live up to our expectations and hopes. What came were decades of military putsches and the dictatorship. We are still dealing with the aftermath today.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, your job is probably one of the most dangerous a politician can have. How do you cope with this, and what do you do to make it bearable?

Maliki: I lead a very simple life -- one that is shaped by external forces, which is apparently what fate has determined for us Iraqis. In that regard, the past few decades of dictatorship have not changed all that much. What keeps me going? The constant exertion of my job -- and the successes we are now having. It means a lot to me to see how much closer we are today to a democratic Iraq, one that respects human rights, than we were only a few months ago.

SPIEGEL: Mr. Prime Minister, thank you for taking the time to speak with us.

Not much to say here. Other than the fact that this is a huge huge huge deal. Article speaks for itself.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes"

And

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

And

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Iraqi PM backs Obama troop exit plan: report
Sat Jul 19, 2008 7:38am EDT

BERLIN (Reuters) - Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki told a German magazine he supported prospective U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's proposal that U.S. troops should leave Iraq within 16 months.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes."

It is the first time he has backed the withdrawal timetable put forward by Obama, who is visiting Afghanistan and us set to go to Iraq as part of a tour of Europe and the Middle East.

Obama has called for a shift away from a "single-minded" focus on Iraq and wants to pull out troops within 16 months, instead adding U.S. soldiers to Afghanistan.

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

Maliki, who is due to visit Germany this week, has suggested a timetable should be set for a U.S. withdrawal but U.S. officials have been more cautious, despite an improving security situation.

The White House said on Friday President George W. Bush and Maliki had agreed that a security deal under negotiation should set a "time horizon" for meeting "aspirational goals" for reducing U.S. forces in Iraq.

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Some five years after the U.S.-led invasion, there are still some 146,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq.

McCain's Hollow Promise To Fight For Equal Pay: 'We'll Take Employers To Court' (THINKPROGRESS 9/18/08)
Last night in a joint townhall meeting, Gov. Sarah Palin (R-AK) and Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) touted their supposed support for gender equality, especially equal pay. Palin called herself "a product of Title IX" and declared she and McCain would "create more legislation" to ensure equal pay. McCain jumped in and declared himself an equally ardent supporter of women's rights, pledging his administration would go to court to protect workplace equality:

In case you need:

Historic Understanding with Iran
· Today, the President announced that the United States – with our allies and partners -- has reached an historic understanding with Iran which, if fully implemented, will prevent it from obtaining a nuclear weapon and make our country, our allies, and our world safer.
· When the President took office, Iran was operating thousands of centrifuges – which can produce the materials for a nuclear bomb – and was concealing a covert nuclear facility.
· The President made clear that America was prepared to resolve this issue diplomatically – but only if Iran came to the table in a serious way. When that did not happen, he rallied the world to impose the toughest sanctions in history—sanctions which had a profound impact on the Iranian economy and helped bring Iran to the negotiating table.
· The world stood with our diplomatic efforts and we were joined at the negotiating table by the world's major powers – the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia, and China, as well as the European Union. So far, Iran has met its obligations to eliminate its stockpile of dangerous nuclear material and increase inspections.

A Good Deal
· Today, after many months of tough, principled diplomacy, we have achieved the framework for a comprehensive deal that meets our core objectives. It's a deal based not on trust, but on unprecedented verification.
· It would cut off every pathway that Iran could take to develop a nuclear weapon and include the most robust and intrusive inspections and transparency regime ever negotiated for any nuclear program in history.
· Key details will be finalized over the next few months, but this is the outline of the deal:
1. Iran will not be able to pursue a bomb using plutonium because it will not develop weapons-grade plutonium. The core of its reactor at Arak will be dismantled and replaced. The spent fuel from that facility will be shipped out of Iran for the life of the reactor. Iran will not build a new heavy water reactor. And Iran will not reprocess fuel from its existing reactors – ever.

2. This deal shuts down Iran's path to a bomb using enriched uranium. Iran has agreed that its installed centrifuges will be reduced by two-thirds. Iran will no longer enrich uranium at its Fordow facility. Iran will not enrich uranium with its advanced centrifuges for at least the next ten years. The vast majority of Iran's stockpile of enriched uranium will be neutralized.

Today, estimates indicate that Iran is only two or three months away from acquiring the raw materials for a single nuclear bomb. Under this deal, Iran has agreed that it will not stockpile the materials needed to build a weapon. Even if it violated the deal, for the next decade, Iran would be at least a year away from acquiring enough material for a bomb. And the strict limitations on Iran's stockpile will last for 15 years.

3. This deal provides the best possible defense against Iran's ability to pursue a nuclear weapon covertly – that is, in secret. International inspectors will have unprecedented access not only to Iranian nuclear facilities, but to the entire supply chain that supports Iran's nuclear program – from uranium mills that provide the raw materials, to the centrifuge production and storage facilities that support the program. If Iran cheats, the world will know it. If we see something suspicious, we will inspect it. Iran's past efforts to weaponize its program will be addressed. With this deal, Iran will face more inspections than any other country in the world.

Long-Term Deal

· This will be a long-term deal that addresses each path to a potential Iranian nuclear bomb.
· There will be strict limits on Iran's program for a decade.
· Additional restrictions – on building new facilities, or stockpiling materials – will last for 15 years. The unprecedented transparency measures will last for 20 years or more – indeed, some will be permanent. And as a member of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, Iran will never be permitted to develop a nuclear weapon.

Phased, Earned Sanctions Relief

· In return for Iran's actions, the international community has agreed to provide Iran with relief from certain sanctions – our own sanctions, and international sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council.
· This relief will be phased as Iran takes steps to adhere to the deal. If Iran violates the deal, sanctions can be snapped back into place. Meanwhile, other American sanctions on Iran—for its support of terrorism, its human rights abuses, and its ballistic missile program—will be fully enforced.

Moving Forward

· The President reiterated that the deal is not yet done – and if there is backsliding from Iran in the months to come, there will be no deal.
· He's instructed his negotiators to fully brief Congress and the American people on the substance of the agreement. And the President is confident that the deal will be shown to be good for the security of the United States, our allies, and the world.
· The President's Administration will engage Congress about how it can play a constructive oversight role, and he will begin that effort by speaking to the leaders of the House and Senate today.
· The President will also speak with Prime Minister Netanyahu to make clear that there is no daylight when it comes to our support for Israel's security and our concerns about Iran's destabilizing policies and threats toward Israel.
· Additionally, today, he will reach out to the leaders of Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to reaffirm our commitment to the security of our partners in the Gulf. And he is inviting the leaders of the six countries who make up the Gulf Cooperation Council to meet me at Camp David this Spring to discuss how we can further strengthen our security cooperation.

Bigger Than Politics

· Inevitably, there will be critics – but the context is crucial and the questions to ask is simple: do you really think that this verifiable deal – backed by the world's major powers – is worse than the risk of another war in the Middle East? Is it worse than doing what we've done for almost two decades, with Iran moving forward and without robust inspections?
· This is not simply a deal between the President's Administration and Iran. It's a deal between Iran, the United States of America, and the major powers in the world – including some of our closest allies.
· If Congress kills this deal—not based on expert analysis, and without offering any reasonable alternative—then it is the United States that will be blamed for the failure of diplomacy. International unity will collapse, and the path to conflict will widen.
· The American people understand this, which is why solid majorities support a diplomatic resolution to the Iranian nuclear issue.

Subject: They. Will. Defund. Planned. Parenthood.

Dear John,

Just two days ago, the U.S. Senate passed legislation to defund Planned Parenthood.[1]

The House of Representatives is dominated by anti-choice Republicans who have voted over and over to defund Planned Parenthood.

And if Republicans win the White House next year, we can kiss Planned Parenthood funding goodbye.

That's what's at stake in 2016. So we're aiming to raise $200,000 by the end of this year to make sure we have the resources to hit the ground running on January 1.

Will you make a generous year-end contribution to NARAL Pro-Choice America right now? Your gift will be DOUBLED by a few generous donors--but only if you give right now.

Planned Parenthood has been attacked by anti-choice extremists for years. But in the past few months, their war on Planned Parenthood has gone nuclear.

Starting with those outrageous, heavily edited and illegally recorded videos, there's been an avalanche of hate, culminating with the tragic killing of three people at a Colorado Planned Parenthood.

And from the beginning, anti-choice presidential candidates have poured fuel on the fire by repeating and even exaggerating the worst lies about Planned Parenthood.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We've been on the front lines of this fight from the start, covering Capitol Hill with policy experts and holding anti-choice Presidential candidates accountable for their unpopular views with our #OwnIt campaign.

Now we're aiming to raise $200,000 before the end of the year, to make sure we have the resources to stop the attacks on Planned Parenthood in 2016.

Will you make a year-end donation to help reach our goal of $200,000 by midnight on December 31? All year-end donations will be doubled.

Thank you for helping to make reproductive freedom real for all women.

cuts that would cause the deficit to explode or would require unprecedented spending cuts equal to one-third of federal spending on domestic programs. How do you respond to that?"

GIULIANI: "A large number of those I proposed myself. I think those are the tax cuts that will spur the economy. You look at what the Democrats want to do, it would be a disaster for the economy. The capital gains rate would go from 15% to double or triple. The tax on dividends would go from double to triple."

GIULIANI: "I think that the Democratic candidates have a very poor understanding of our economy at the kind of stage it is at right now."

Jimmy Kimmel Airs Fake McCain Youth Outreach Ad (ABC 04/22/08 12:14am)
JIMMY KIMMEL: Arizona's senator John McCain has pulled ahead now of Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, in several recent polls. If elected, you know, he will be 105 years old when he takes office. Which would make him the oldest president ever. It makes sense that he doesn't have a lot of support from younger voters, but he's not giving up on the youth vote. In fact, he has a new ad running that I guess is designed specifically to show young people that he's still with it.

FAKE MCCAIN: Hey, America's youth, John McCain is down with you. Whether I'm listening to chubby checker on my hi-fi or sneaking liquor into a drive-in movie or stuffing myself into a phone booth with 20 of my frat brothers John McCain is far out. So vote for cool cat John McCain. I'll share my drugs with you!

JAY LENO: "According to some of the political blogs, Democratic operatives have been looking for dirt on John McCain since February. You know what you call someone who digs up dirt on John McCain? An archaeologist."

LENO: "And earlier this evening, President Bush made an appearance on the tv show "Deal or No Deal." President Bush was on "Deal or No Deal." I guess he got turned down for "Are you smarter than a fifth grader?" He couldn't get on that one… And in an interview, First Lady Laura Bush, who used to be a librarian, by the way, said she cannot fall asleep without reading. That's what she says. She can't fall asleep without reading. As opposed to her husband, who can't read without falling asleep. That's the whole difference.

LENO: "Speaking of reading, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld now working on a book about his strategy for the war in Iraq. It will be a while before it goes to the publisher 'cause he just doesn't know how to end it. Can't come up with an ending. See, much like his real life."

John McCain's 70th birthday bash held on boat of Russian tycoon By Wayne Madsen Online Journal Contributing Writer

(WMR) -- John McCain's campaign is trying to make political hay out of the conviction of Chicago tycoon Tony Rezko, a one-time fundraiser for presumptive Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama. However, the McCain campaign wants to bury the story of McCain's 70th birthday bash held on board the yacht of a Russian aluminum tycoon in the Adriatic Sea. The party was held on August 29, 2006, McCain's birthday and followed a congressional junket by McCain and five other GOP senators to the Republic of Georgia.

The host for McCain's yacht party off the coast of the Republic of Montenegro was, according to WMR sources with close links to the Republican Party, Oleg Deripaska, one of Russia's most powerful tycoons who made his billions in cornering Russia's aluminum market in the 1990s.

The 40-year old Deripaska is also politically-connected, having married the daughter of Russia's late President Boris Yeltsin. Unlike most other Russian tycoons, who now live in exile abroad and are protected by Israeli passports, Deripaska maintains close relations to Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin and another Russian tycoon, Roman Abramovich, who was also invested in Russia's aluminum industry. In 2000, Deripaska merged his firm, Basic Element, with Abramovich's firm, RusAl. Both tycoons maintain expensive homes in London.

Deripaska has attracted the attention of U.S. law enforcement and he has been the subject of several civil law suits filed against him because of his business practices. However, no federal criminal charges have been brought against Deripaska. That is because Yeltsin's son-in-law counts, in addition to McCain, former GOP Senator and 1996 GOP presidential candidate Bob Dole among his most ardent supporters. In 2005, Deripaska paid Dole $500,000 in lobbying fees and was granted a visa to enter the United States.

However, in 2006, the Wall Street Journal reported that the U.S. government refused to grant Deripaska another visa because the FBI discovered he made "inaccurate statements" to the bureau.

In the past, the Canadian firm Magna

International, in which Deripaska is a $1.5 billion investor, attempted to buy Daimler Chrysler. The deal ultimately fell through.

McCain and Deripaska first met at a dinner party held concurrently with the Davos World Economic Forum in January 2006 in Switzerland. The party was hosted by Canadian gold mining billionaire Peter Munk, owner of Barrick Gold, which has counted former President George H. W. Bush, former Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, former Senator Howard Baker, major Democratic Party lawyer/lobbyist Vernon Jordan, and former German Central Bank President Karl Otto Pohl among the members of its International Advisory Board. The party was arranged by McCain's 2000 campaign manager Rick Davis of the Washington lobbying group Davis Manafort. Attending the meeting in Davos were McCain, Davis, Deripaska, and Senators Saxby Chambliss (R-GA) and John Sununu (R-NH), as well as the host, Munk.

On August 29, 2006, McCain attended a dinner party in Montenegro that was followed by a champagne reception on a yacht that was hosted by Deripaska. Also reportedly in attendance was Davis, whose lobbying firm was representing the government of Montenegro; Munk; and Nathan Rothschild who, on March 20 of this year held a controversial fundraiser for McCain at Spencer House in London. The fundraiser raised questions about McCain receiving illegal "in kind" contributions from a foreign national.

The 70th birthday bash was reportedly a promise of huge cash donations to McCain's forthcoming presidential campaign, another indication of violations of law prohibiting donations from foreign sources. The quid pro quo for Derpaska was that McCain and his top lobbyists were pushing the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company (EADS) and its Airbus subsidiary to receive the lucrative US Air Force contract to replace the Air Force's fleet of refueling tankers. The reported source for the aluminum in the Airbus tanker aircraft is Deripaska's Russian Aluminum Company (RusAl).

Some two weeks after the McCain birthday bash in Montenegro, the Russian state-owned Vneshtorgbank announced that it was acquiring more than 5 percent of EADS. At the same time, it was announced that RusAl was in negotiations to merge with a Russian aluminum competitor, SUAL, and Glencore of Switzerland, the firm owned by billionaire American fugitive Marc Rich.

The nexus of McCain with Russian oligarchs like Deripaska, as well as Munk, Rothschild, and Rich signifies that McCain is owned and operated by the very same entrenched global interests who have held sway in Washington during the seven-plus years of the George W. Bush administration.

Conservatives' Dangerous and Reckless Iran Response

Washington, D.C. - American conservatives are showing their true colors in their response to demonstrations in Iran. Despite the almost unanimous opinion of serious Iran experts that it would be very harmful to the demonstrators if the United States were seen as directly supporting them, conservative political leaders - such as Mike Pence, Eric Cantor, and John McCain - and thinkers - such as Robert Kagan - have insisted that the United States do just that. Ascertaining the motives of these conservatives is difficult - are they so blinded by ideology that they actually don't recognize that U.S. meddling would play into Ahmadinejad's hands and would potentially further endanger Iranian demonstrators; or are they simply trying to score cheap political points by attacking Obama. But what is clear is that their cries, recommendations, and critiques are reflective of a conservative movement that on foreign policy has run off the rails.

Calling for the United States to directly support the protests - even symbolically - could place the demonstrators in severe danger. The Iranian regime is feverishly attempting to label the demonstrators as western agitators backed by the United States - Iranian state television even used a clip from FOX News in an effort to make this point. Therefore the calls from Pence, Kantor, and McCain are not only just unhelpful but they are a total gift to Ahmadinejad. Furthermore, conservatives seem oblivious to their own record of failure to promote democracy under the Bush administration, as democracy failed to advance and even receded in much of the world. Aggressive sounding talk, threats of force, and an over emphasis on the mere holding of elections served only to strengthen hardliners and undermine the United States.

- Iranians, Iranian Americans, journalists, and Iranian national security experts all agree that the last thing Iranian demonstrators need is U.S. interference. There is an overwhelming consensus among journalists following Iran, experts on Iran, and Iranians themselves that U.S. interference in the current turmoil would strengthen hardliners, and put demonstrators in harm's way:
- Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns: "President Ahmadinejad would like nothing better than to see aggressive statements, a series of statements, from the United States which try to put the US at the center of this." [Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns, 6/16/09]
- National Iranian American Council President and Iran Expert Trita Parsi: "I think it's quite reckless to turn this into a political football here in the United States. In reality, this can have severe repercussions on the streets of Tehran, if the protests are being casted as being orchestrated from the United States." [Trita Parsi, 6/16/09]
- Iran Expert and Former NSC Official Gary Sick: "Anything we do or say is going to be interpreted in Iran as interference in their domestic affairs and it will tarnish anyone who is in anyway seen as being supported by the United States." [Gary Sick, 6/15/09]
- Carnegie Endowment Iran Expert Karim Sadjadpour: "[W]e don't want to denounce these elections and insert ourselves into that political process which is playing out in Tehran. Historically, we have unwittingly hurt those whom we've tried to help in the past." [Carnegie Endowment Iran Expert Karim Sadjadpour, 6/15/09]
- Spokesman for the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran Hadi Ghaemi: "It is better for the U.S. not to comment and make itself part of the equation... By supporting one faction versus another, the U.S. would not be helpful at all." [Spokesman for the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran Hadi Ghaemi, 6/15/09]
- Iranian Expatriate via Andrew Sullivan: "I'm an Iranian living in Canada. A few hours ago I talked to my brother who is a student at Sharif University, he was at the big rally yesterday and they were only feet away from Karoubi when they marched from the university entrance to Azadi square. He asked what had Obama had said and I started reading the transcript. When I got to 'the United States can be a handy political football, or discussions with the United States [can be]' my brother sighed and said thank God this guy gets it." [Iranian expatriate reported by Andrew Sullivan, 6/16/09]
- Washington Independent Reporter Spencer Ackerman: "American rhetorical support will immediately become a cudgel in the hands of Ahmadinejad." [Spencer Ackerman, Washington Independent, 6/15/09]

Nevertheless, conservatives endanger protestors in Iran in order to advance narrow political objectives. Despite pleas from Iranians and insistence from experts, conservatives latched on to protests in Iran as a means of attacking the administration, putting both the protests and U.S. interests in jeopardy. Seizing on the instability in Iran as a means to score political points, Congressman Mike Spence (R - IN) introduced a resolution supporting Iranian dissidents, which read: "While the President may be 'troubled by the violence,' he has yet to express the unqualified support of the American people for those who are courageously risking their lives for free elections and democracy in Iran. If the President of the United States will not express our nation's solidarity with the dissidents in the streets of Tehran, then Congress must." Spence's resolution received the backing of conservative leadership, as second-ranking minority Member Eric Cantor (R - VA) issued a statement saying "The Administration's silence in the face of Iran's brutal suppression of democratic rights represents a step backwards for homegrown democracy in the Mideast. President Obama must take a strong public position in the face of violence and human rights abuses." Cantor and Spence's conservative colleagues in the Senate echoed these extreme positions. Long-time foreign policy hawk and occasional conservative ally Joe Lieberman (I - CT) proclaimed: "We as Americans have a responsibility to stand in solidarity with people when they are denied their rights by repressive regimes. When elections are stolen, our government should protest. When peaceful demonstrators are beaten and silenced, we have a duty to raise our voices on their behalf. We must tell the Iranian people that we are on their side." And, as the Politico reports this morning, Sen. John McCain (R - AZ) demanded on NBC that "that the United States should make clear that it backs anti-Mahmoud Ahmadinejad demonstrators in their battle against 'an oppressive, repressive regime.'" [Rep. Mike Pence (R-IN), 6/16/09 . Rep. Eric Cantor (R-VA), 6/15/09 . Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I-CT), 6/14/09 . Politico, 6/17/09]

Conservatives' approach - which is based on dangerous ideology and ignorance of the situation in Iran - would endanger demonstrators and undermine broader U.S. objectives. Commentator Joe Klein remarked that the comments by McCain and his conservative colleagues are consistent with their "dangerous habit of making broad, extreme statements based on ideology rather than detailed knowledge of the situation in Iran and elsewhere." Even right-wing commentator Pat Buchannan condemned the approach taken by congressional conservatives, saying: "When your adversary is making a fool of himself, get out of the way... U.S. fulminations will change nothing in Tehran. But they would enable the regime to divert attention to U.S. meddling in Iran's affairs and portray the candidate robbed in this election, Mir-Hossein Mousavi, as a poodle of the Americans." Nico Pitney of the Huffington Post reported Iranian national television playing clips of FOX News to show that foreign press was trying to divide the Iranian people in order to take advantage of a weakened Iran. Trita Parsi explains their approach is not based on any familiarity with the situation in Iran: "They're [conservatives] coming out and saying that we should side with the opposition, with Moussavi. I'm really curious to know if they've been in contact with Moussavi, and asked him if he thinks that's a good idea. That's the test that we've failed to pass in the past, in the sense that we've made up our mind on what they should want, and then we act. And then, even when it doesn't work out the way that we hoped for, we think that it's their fault, that they did understanding, genuinely, how positive our intentions were. We can't do it this way." [Joe Klein, 6/16/09 . Pat Buchannan, 6/16/09 . Huffington Post, 6/16/09 . Trita Parsi, 6/16/09]

Conservatives claim Obama and progressives don't care about democracy promotion, but after Bush's eight years of failure they have no legs to stand on. Robert Kagan wrote in the Washington Post today that, "[t]he turmoil in Iran since last week's election has confused the foreign policy debate here in the United States in interesting ways. Supporters of President Obama, who until very recently had railed against the Bush administration's 'freedom agenda' and who insisted on a new 'realism,' have suddenly found themselves rooting for freedom and democracy in Iran... His [Obama's] strategy toward Iran places him objectively on the side of the government's efforts to return to normalcy as quickly as possible, not in league with the opposition's efforts to prolong the crisis." Contrary to the claims of Kagan, progressives railed against Bush's "freedom agenda" not because they oppose the promotion of democracy, but because Bush's efforts both totally failed and were pursued in ways that undermined democracy and hurt America's national interests. The invasion of Iraq is the most clear example of neoconservatives efforts to promote democracy through the barrel of a gun. Yet it was the Bush administration, by giving only insubstantial and inconsistent support for democracy promotion that damaged democracy promotion efforts abroad. When the Bush administration was not invading countries to promote "freedom," its democracy promotion efforts were almost solely based on calling for elections. In the Middle East, from Iraq to Lebanon to the Palestinian territories, the Bush administration pushed elections, while ignoring the need to support liberal institutions, individual rights, rule of law, and the role of civil society that are necessary to build long-lasting democracy. Meanwhile, President Bush kept silent on the various illiberal policies of nations like Russia and Pakistan, where the president preferred a policy based on personal relationships with the dictatorial leaders. [Robert Kagan, 6/17/09 . Washington Post, 8/20/08 . Washington Post, 8/27/08]

Policeman Prevents Car Bombing in Jerusalem

A car bombing attack that was planned for Jerusalem was averted thanks to the alertness of a traffic cop who stopped a suspicious vehicle on the road between Maale Adumim and Jerusalem. The car was being driven by a Palestinian woman from Jericho, who allegedly cried out "Allahu akbar," after being pulled over and detonated the charge in her car, which reportedly was packed with gas balloons. The traffic cop who stopped her sustained light injuries whereas she suffered from serious injuries.

Shin Bet Tells Government: Abbas Not Encouraging Terror

A senior official at the Shin Bet security service said at the weekly Israeli government meeting that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is not encouraging terrorism "and is even instructing his security forces to prevent terror attacks as much as possible." However, according to a senior official that took part in the meeting, the Shin Bet official said the opposite about senior Palestinian Authority and PLO officials. These officials, he said, "are part of the incitement campaign that is exasperating the violence."

Stop Urging Violence, Abbas Tells Fatah Militant Leaders

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas told the leaders of his Fatah movement's Tanzim militant wing Sunday to immediately work to calm spiraling tensions with Israel. According to Palestinian sources, he demanded that the Tanzim representatives, who serve as heads of local branches of the paramilitary group throughout the West Bank, avoid using violence in the struggle against Israel. Israeli officials have charged that Tanzim leaders, including the organization's local leaders, encouraged the growing protests, in part to prevent rival group Hamas from gaining control of developments in the Palestinian street.

Fatah Leaders Split Over Support for Disturbances

Differences have erupted among top leaders of the Fatah faction regarding the latest wave of attacks against Israelis, Palestinian sources said on Sunday. According to the sources, as reported by the Rai Al-Youm online newspaper, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who is also head of Fatah, has been facing demands from some of the faction's leaders to openly support the new Palestinian intifada. These leaders are reportedly unhappy with the PA's failure to play any role in or support the current wave of attacks on Israelis, the sources told Rai Al-Youm.

Hamas Turns Blind Eye To Fatah's Military Activities in Gaza

Despite the ban imposed by Hamas on Fatah's activities in the Gaza Strip since it took control in June 2007, and despite the intensification of political differences between the two parties, the military relationship on the ground looks different: Fatah's military wing, Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, is conducting unrestricted military training in Gaza. Questions arise regarding the nature of the relationship between Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and Hamas and about the brigades' adoption of armed resistance, although Fatah leader and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas rejects the armed struggle against Israel.

Security Forces Thwart Stabbing Attack in Jerusalem

A Palestinian assailant was shot and killed after trying to stab a Border Policeman in Jerusalem's Old City, the site of numerous similar attacks recently. The terrorist attempted to conduct a stabbing attack near the Lion's Gate in Jerusalem's Old City on Monday morning, when he walked up to a border policeman and stabbed him in his vest. The border policeman was not wounded and security forces immediately opened fire on the terrorist, killing him.

Interior Committee Chair: "There Is No Security In Jerusalem"

The Knesset's Interior Committee held a session on Monday afternoon to discuss the deteriorating security situation in Jerusalem, just hours after an Arab terrorist was shot in the capital's Old City as he attempted to stab a security guard. The Committee meeting was opened by statements from its chair, MK Dudi Amsalem (Likud), who noted that he had initiated the meeting several months ago although it was postponed at the request of Internal Security Minister Gilad Erdan (Likud). "There's no security in Jerusalem," began Amsalem, who recounted the seemingly unending list of stabbings, rock and firebomb throwing and general rioting being conducted by Arab terrorists in and around the capital in recent months - and particularly in recent weeks.

Mideast Quartet Cancels Trip to Jerusalem, Ramallah

Representatives of the Mideast Quartet who were set to visit Jerusalem and Ramallah this week have cancelled the trip. The delegation, representing the U.S., Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, was meant to discuss an end to the unrest as well as trust-building measures between Israel and the Palestinians. A senior official in Jerusalem said the announcement was conveyed to Israel on Monday afternoon, noting that the reason for the unexpected cancellation wasn't entirely clear. According to the official, some of the messages received in Jerusalem indicated that the members of the Quartet felt the sides aren't interested in international involvement and in the delegation's visit at this time.

The Seamline

By Alon Ben David

This is not a wave of terror, neither is it an Intifada, this is a new situation, and it is not about to end anytime soon. Even if there is a certain drop in the violence in the next few days, which is likely, the violence and the terror attacks will not stop: neither in the territories nor in Jerusalem nor throughout Israel. Faced with this new situation, Israel must take stronger deterrent steps against the perpetrator s and their families, and separate between Israelis and Palestinians in every place possible.

We enjoyed the status of being a "villa in the jungle" in recent years and the thought that the insane wave of violence sweeping our region would remain outside our borders, but in today's networked world, there are no real borders and it was just a matter of time until this atmosphere of violence would also reach our close neighbors and reach those among us, inside Israel. This did not begin last month, nor did it begin in Operation Protective Edge. For some years the atmosphere of violence among the Palestinians has been intensifying.

All around them is a Middle East that mainly lives by the knife. The PA deluges them with ultra-violent films that document this—and this has an effect. Polls conducted by the IDF and by civilian research institutions found that more than 10% of Palestinians support ISIS's ideology. That is the highest rate of support from among all the countries in the region. Every once in a while a spark comes along that ignites these toxic fumes, and this time, it was the rumors of a change in the status quo on the Temple Mount.

Most of us have the sense that this is an Intifada. The pictures shown on television look similar to the Intifadas we know. But there is still a major difference: the Palestinian public, in its overwhelming majority, has not joined in the events. Even Fatah's armed Tanzim, the major force in the territories after the Palestinian Authority, is not taking part in the clashes.

In Kalandiya, at the Ayosh junction and at Rachel's Tomb, you can see hundreds of young people clashing with the IDF, but these are not the thousands that we saw in the first and second Intifadas. On the day that we see the masses, or the Tanzim, taking part in demonstrations, and let's hope that that day will not come, then we can use the term Intifada. At the moment, we are facing a wave of violence and terror that is mainly terrorism by individuals.

The majority of the Palestinian public feels that it has no reason to embark on another confrontation. True, it has despaired in the political sense, but it wants to hold onto the little that it has—a livelihood, freedom of movement and a life that is, all in all, reasonable in comparison to what is happening in the majority of the Middle East. True, events have an accumulative effect, but the critical mass has not yet been created for a large-scale uprising. A major event on the Temple Mount or another lethal Jewish terror attack could create such a mass.

There are still some effective shock absorbers in Judea and Samaria, but they are being eroded. The PA, despite the declarations of the prime minister, is a restraining factor, not the opposite. It is not a lover of Zion and even less so a Netanyahu fan. The politically battered Abu Mazen cannot even condemn terror attacks, but does not at all encourage them and is trying to suppress the violence.

Too Little Too Late

In this context, it was surprising to see the restraints working for Gaza. Usually, the Gaza Strip responds quickly to events in Judea and Samaria. The events of Operation Brother's Keeper last year spurred Hamas into war at the time whereas now—complete silence. Now too, nobody can guarantee that this will last, but as of now, Hamas's rational thinking, to not drag Gaza into another war, is taking precedence over emotion.

Hamas praises and extols the individual terrorists and calls on more young people to join them, on condition that this takes place in the West Bank and not in the Gaza Strip. These lone wolves, who usually act on a momentary impulse, know that both Hamas and the PA will look out for their families, whether they are killed in the terror attack or whether they emerge alive. They know that their families will be eligible for generous allowances and they know the honor that the family of a shahid commands. This knowledge must be shaken.

The demolitions of terrorists' homes, which were renewed last week, are taking place too rarely and too late. It also appears that they are not having the desired deterrent effect. A stricter punitive policy toward the individual terrorists who are now on their way into Israel must be adopted: from denying their rights to expulsion to the Gaza Strip. The individual terrorist deliberating whether to turn the steering wheel of his car into a group of Israelis must know that he is sentencing his family to a life of wretchedness. This will not stop all the terrorists, but it will cause the majority of them to think twice if it's worth it.

In Jerusalem, despite the 5,600 police deployed there, the police find it difficult to prevent terror attacks in the Old City. One terror attack follows on the heels of another terror attack on Haguy Street, the most heavily guarded alley in Israel, indicating that there must be a change in the entrance arrangements into the city and that metal detectors must be installed at the Old City gates. A number of metal detectors were installed yesterday [last Thursday] as a pilot, but more thorough searches must be conducted at all the gates of the Old City.

True, this will greatly impede normal life and will require much more work of the police, it's also true that there will be terrorists who will obtain a knife after entering the Old City, but there is no choice but to conduct more meticulous checks at the gates, which will prevent the unbearable ease with which terror attacks take place today.

The prime minister's decision to ban high profile visits to the Temple Mount is also a step in the right direction, but it should have been done two weeks earlier. The Temple Mount is the most flammable of sites, and that is where quiet must be instated. The ability to hold Friday prayers on the Temple Mount without violence will be an indication of things to follow.

Of all places, the police were successful in containing events on the seamline in the capital. After years of avoiding entering and enforcing the law in the Palestinian villages of Jerusalem, the fact that today, police and Border Police troops have a presence in all these villages, keeps the violence away from the Jewish neighborhoods on the seamline. The clashes take place inside the villages while in the nearby Israeli neighborhoods –Armon Hanatziv and Mount Scopus—the violence is less.

But in order to reach this point, the police emptied most of the rest of the State of Israel of police to bring them to Jerusalem. Sometime soon, they will go back to their own districts, and the seamline will again be set on fire. Jerusalem is desperate for a large and permanent police force, and even more, it is desperate for separation. The only thing that will make it possible for residents of the front line in the Armon Hanatziv neighborhood to make it home in the evening without fear of stones and firebombs is a wall that will separate them from Jabel Mukaber.

For that to happen, the fact that Jerusalem is not actually united has to be admitted, and then to start building dividers between the populations. Anyone who expects Issawiya and Sur Baher to become quiet, pleasant neighborhoods of Israeli Jerusalem—most likely are not familiar with these villages. Yes, the majority of their residents work in western Jerusalem, and they have lived next to Jerusalem neighborhoods for many years now, but they were and remain part of Palestinian society.

All this brings us back to the basic, unanswered question: what does Israel want? What borders does it want to live inside? In the last interview he gave before his death, the late Maj. Gen. Benny Peled, the former Air Force commander, said that Israel had never used its might to achieve a political goal. That it had always addressed what the other side was demanding in exchange for peace, and had never tried to go to the other side and to dictate to it from a position of strength, the kind of arrangement that it wanted. But to that end, Israel would have to decide, finally, for itself, among itself, what its borders are and what kind of arrangement it wants in order to continue to exist.

Abbas Can't Control the Lost Generation of Oslo

Tens of thousands of families in East Jerusalem and the West Bank fear for the safety of their children, but are also proud that the young people collectively are showing that they are fed up.

By Amira Haas

Tens of thousands of families in the West Bank and East Jerusalem are currently living in fear that their children will be killed, injured or arrested in confrontations with the Israeli army or while attempting to carry out lone-wolf attacks.

When their children leave in the morning, they don't know whether they are really going to school or to friends or to demonstrate at an army checkpoint or to attack an Israeli with a knife. No less than the Israeli and Palestinian intelligence forces, the parents are amazed at the mass, unorganized wave sweeping over the young generation of Palestinians and putting them at risk.

In the face of this uncertainty, each family knows that it, too, may become a statistic, subject to collective punishment — subject to having its home demolished or sealed, having a family member expelled from Jerusalem, having siblings or parents arrested and beaten by security forces or being targeted for months on end by the Shin Bet security service. For the time being, it appears that the green light that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gave for collective punishment and shooting at demonstrators is not deterring the lone wolves and the thousands of young people gathering at checkpoints, defying fate and the soldiers.

One of the assumptions of Israeli and Palestinian intelligence is that those carrying out the lone-wolf attacks are influenced by social media. That's true, but they are also influenced by video clips, some of which appear on Israeli sites first, depicting the routine violence that Israel directs at Palestinians. Those speaking of incitement are underestimating the influence of Israeli soldiers killing Palestinians civilians.

For instance, there are the cases of Ahmed Khatatbeh of Beit Furik and Hadil Hashlamun of Hebron, whom the Israel Defense Forces claimed were shot to death after attacking soldiers. A press investigation revealed that no such attack occurred. And then, early last Sunday, there was the case of Fadi Alon of Isawiyah in Jerusalem. The police said he had stabbed a Jew and was therefore shot to death. A YouTube video on Israeli websites showed clearly that, even if he did carry out a stabbing, he didn't pose a danger to anyone when he was shot. It also showed that young Jews had told a policeman to shoot him without knowing what Alon had allegedly done. The videos are fodder, ready to ignite the situation, but they are not the reason for it.

Every family fearing for a son or daughter lives this fodder in the form of the Israeli occupation, so they are not only fearful but also proud in advance. They cry a collective "we've had enough," these young people, the lost generation of the Oslo Accords of the 1990s. They don't have the independent state they were promised, don't have active political organizations or a leadership they can look up to. They also don't have prospects for a good job and feel increasingly hemmed in by Jewish settlements.

There is a major difference between the lone-wolf attackers and the thousands of young people marching to West Bank army checkpoints. The lone-wolf is indeed very alone and has reached the depths of despair. The confrontations at the checkpoints, as with any collective action, is a kind of public gathering, which despite the risks involved, has a social dimension, providing a sense of being able to influence the situation.

Palestinian spokespeople are careful not to call the clashes an intifada, but rather a mass outburst, which is appropriate under the circumstances. An intifada, as the Palestinians understand it, is an organized uprising with a clear and unified goal directed by a recognized and accepted leadership. That's far from the current situation.

The disintegrating Fatah movement can't lead the outburst and turn it into an uprising, but it has warned against the use of live ammunition at demonstrations, which it says would serve Israel's needs. Hamas, which is a semi-underground movement in the West Bank, also can't and perhaps wouldn't dare, although the Islamic bloc at the universities, which is identified with Hamas, has called for its followers to join in the current unrest.

And Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas? Several days ago, when newspapers began reporting the clashes and the casualties, he found time to dedicate the new, luxurious headquarters of a construction and investment firm, Consolidated Contractors Company, at a location in the West Bank town of El Bireh that is two kilometers at most from the restive Beit El checkpoint.

Abbas is trying to project a sense of business as usual. Perhaps he knows something the young demonstrators don't. But the time he found for the dedication of the company offices shows how cut off he is from the public. Reality shows that he has no authority or power to prevent this lost Oslo generation from going to the checkpoints and expressing their collective cry of "we're fed up," which ultimately is also directed at Abbas himself.

Here's a Q and A we did on her record; looks like you have her statement but pasting below as well for convenience:

Didn't North Korea increase its nuclear arsenal on your watch? Hasn't the Obama Administration neglected this problem?

This is North Korea's fourth nuclear test, if it is verified. North Korea's nuclear breakout and its first nuclear test happened under George W. Bush's administration, which was putting almost all of its energy into Iraq. When I became Secretary, I saw the need to up our game in Asia - to build stronger alliances - and to improve our military posture.

We also worked with our allies to test whether North Korea would take concrete steps to denuclearize. Unfortunately, North Korea quickly made clear that it had no interest in abiding by commitments it made. And we made clear that we would not be blackmailed or settle for Pyongyang's terms.

So we built a global coalition to expand sanctions on North Korea. We also worked with our allies to block numerous attempts by North Korea to proliferate. We cut off some of North Korea's key arms clients. And we enhanced our defense posture in the region to deal with the evolving threat.

It's also important to remember that when I became Secretary, our relations with the ROK and Japan were frayed. I worked to restore those ties and to ensure that we put our allies first – and to make clear that we would not cut a deal at their expense. And we took important steps – including to deepen cooperation on missile defense.

Now North Korea has continued its defiance. So we need to be resolute in response, increasing pressure and sending Pyongyang an unmistakable message that its nuclear brinksmanship won't succeed. We need to make clear that we will take whatever steps are necessary to defend our allies in the region. And we need to press the Chinese government, which wields influence with the North Koreans, to be more assertive in deterring the North's irresponsible actions. It should take actions to halt prohibited activities transpiring across its borders or its firms that participate in illicit trade or proliferation will have to face sanctions.

Statement From Hillary Clinton on North Korea's Apparent Nuclear Test

Hillary Clinton released the following statement Wednesday about North Korea's apparent nuclear test:

"I strongly condemn North Korea's apparent nuclear test. If verified, this is a provocative and dangerous act, and North Korea must have no doubt that we will take whatever steps are necessary to defend ourselves and our treaty allies, South Korea and Japan. North Korea's goal is to blackmail the world into easing the pressure on its rogue regime. We can't give in to or in any way encourage this kind of bullying. Instead, we should increase pressure and send Pyongyang an unmistakable message that its nuclear brinksmanship won't succeed.

"The United States and our partners, including the UN Security Council, need to immediately impose additional sanctions against North Korea. The Chinese government, which wields influence with the North Koreans, must be more assertive in deterring the North's irresponsible actions, and it should take actions to halt prohibited activities transpiring across its borders or its firms that participate in illicit trade or proliferation will have to face sanctions. We should also work with our allies to strengthen our missile defenses.

"As Secretary I championed the United States' pivot to the Asia Pacific - including shifting additional military assets to the theater – in part to confront threats like North Korea and to support our allies. I worked to get not just our allies but also Russia and China on board for the strongest sanctions yet.

“North Korea’s nuclear and missile tests, its human rights record, the cyber hack of Sony this past December -- highlight the continuing threat that North Korea poses.

“And threats like this are yet another reminder of what’s at stake in this election. We cannot afford reckless, imprudent publicity stunts that risk war. We need a Commander-in-Chief with the experience and judgement to deal with a dangerous North Korea on Day One.”

Reports out of Baghdad are that the Bush administration and the Iraqi Government are close to an agreement that would include a timetable for the withdrawal of American combat forces by the end of 2010. This timetable is very similar to the one proposed by Barack Obama and other progressive leaders, security experts Prime Minister Maliki and the Iraqi Government. Unfortunately, John McCain continues to cling to the idea of a permanent American presence in Iraq and continues to claim that Obama's timeline strategy would "forfeit" the war in Iraq.

Iraqi officials report that Iraq and the U.S. are nearing an agreement for a 2010 redeployment timeline for U.S. combat forces. According to Iraqi officials, Iraq and the U.S. are near an agreement to have U.S. forces out of Iraqi cities by June 30, 2009 and all combat troops out of the country by October 2010. Under the plan, which has yet to be officially adopted by the Bush Administration, all support personnel would be withdrawn "around 2013." Still at issue is the administration's demand for immunity for U.S. soldiers under Iraqi law. [AP, 8/8/08]

Despite statements from Iraq's Prime Minister supporting a timeline similar to Senator Obama's and the Bush administration's greater willingness to accept timelines, John McCain continues to cling to the idea of a permanent American presence and claimed this week that Senator Obama wants to "forfeit" the war in Iraq. Last month, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki endorsed a vision for a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq, saying "U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes." He added, "Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems" and setting timetables would not be an "admission of defeat." Later statements by Iraq's National Security Advisor, Mouwaffak al-Rubaie, and, Iraq's Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi both echoed Maliki's statement. Nonetheless, in his weekly radio address, McCain spoke on Obama's plan in Iraq, stating, "We're finally winning in Iraq, and he wants to forfeit." [LA Times, 8/8/08 ; Reuters, 7/7/08 ; AP, 7/9/08; Huff Post, 7/10/08 ; Der Spiegel, 7/20/08]

Any agreement should be run through a transparent process that includes Congress, the American people and the Iraqi Parliament instead of being negotiated in secret. If the agreement involves a long term security commitment to Iraq, it must be approved by the Congress. Any such commitment would tie the hands of a subsequent administration and constitute a legally-binding treaty that must be ratified before the Senate. [U.S. Constitution . House Committee on Foreign Affairs, 7/23/08]

Summary of Shift: Interest in Charlie Black's terror remarks has continued into the second evening of news coverage with less momentum than last night. Chris Matthews led with the story on Hardball as did Keith Olbermann. Several people have now invoked the Michael Hensley maxim on gaffes in response to the statement. Doug Imus' controversial comments received only slightly less coverage.
Reports on Barack Obama's alleged snub of Muslims also took a spot on tonight's television news stage. Also o n the democratic side, reporters and anchors took interest in the Clinton family again with Bill's endorsement of Obama and Hillary's return to the Senate. Trent Lott: Defends Charlie Black "as one of the finest people in Washington DC" (MSNBC 06/24/08 3:00pm)
REPORTER: Before we get to Senator McCain's energy proposals, his adviser Charlie Black has now apologized for saying that another terrorist attack would be an advantage for John McCain. I'm wondering what your reaction is to these comments. It's been painted a little bit like something a lot of people have been thinking about but simply wouldn't say because it's not PC frankly.

TRENT LOTT: Well, first I know Charlie Black as one of the finest people in Washington DC. I've known him for a long time, I consider him a personal friend. So I have to admit that. He has apologized for it and certainly would have probably chosen a different way to say that. But it was, he was responding to a question. There is no doubt in anybody's mind that when it comes to foreign policy, defense, the terrorism issue, John McCain is strong in that area. And sometimes I worry that the American people have sort of, you know, stopped being aware or they have kind of forgotten the real dangers that we face from terrorists all over this country and all around the world.

So I know that's what Charlie was saying. He was basically saying, 'Well look, this is a strong suit for John McCain based on his background, his history, his leadership, in this area.' He didn't mean to you know to say it or make it sound the way it did and ohh good, you know if we had another strike, it would be beneficial. You shouldn't look at it that way. But you should look at the fact that you need the strongest person possible that will deter another terrorist attack.

Pfotenhauer on CNN Dodges Questions about the 'Psychological Impact' of Offshore Drilling (CNN 06/24/08 8:07pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: […] 'Psychological impact' – that what people really need right now? Is that what they want to hear?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Campbell, you can't take it out of context. I mean, we have—Senator McCain has proposed a comprehensive plan that will give relief in the short-term with the gas tax moratorium, will give near-term relief with energy exploration and development and will give long-term relief through innovation alternatives.

BROWN: What do you mean by that? I don't think we're necessarily pulling that out of context. I just want clarification.

PFOTENHAUER: What I'm saying is it's one piece of a broad, comprehensive plan that will bring result[s] as opposed to Barack Obama. Now we've all been talking a lot about speculators and the role that speculators may have had in why oil prices are so high. You can't say, 'Speculators have contributed to the problem,' and then deny the fact that expectations and market expectations affect reality. That's what futures markets do.

So, of course, future expectations affect prices in the near-term, very, very quickly […]. So it's a very important signal to send to the OPEC countries that have no interest in America doing well here and saying, 'We are no longer going to sit on our hands about supply constraints. We're gonna do something about it.'

PFOTENHAUER: The windfall profits tax was tried once and it failed miserably. It punishes domestic production and so it falls and therefore increases our reliance on foreign oil and it punishes consumers because it increases prices. Senator Obama truly is Dr. No in this arena.

He has said, 'No' to gas tax relief, no to drilling, no to nuclear, no to batteries. The only thing he says yes to is increase taxes. Increase windfall profit tax on oil, increase on coal, increase on natural gas, as I've said—a perfect storm on bad energy policy.

PFOTENHAUER: Well, it just reveals ignorance if [McCain's $300 million battery contest] sounds gimmicky because battery technology is a lynchpin for securing our energy independence—

BROWN: But wait! It's the incentive, I guess, in comparison to other methods for how you would go about it.

PFOTENHAUER: […] Senator Obama has praised Senator McCain for his leadership on environmental issues because he proposed the global climate change bill with Senator Lieberman. So Senator Obama has praised Senator McCain's leadership when he wasn't running against him for president. Onto battery technology: the future is not biofuels like ethanol because that still requires oil.

It's not hydrogen. It's not natural gas. We don't have the infrastructure—

BROWN: But the question isn't about battery technology, it's about holding a contest! I mean why—is that what it takes, I guess to get people motivated to deal with the problem?

PFOTENHAUER: Well it's certainly a lot more efficient than just pumping billions of dollars in through the government infrastructure that has produced nothing. Senator Obama's plan is a lot like Jimmy Carter's where we spent billions of dollars and didn't get results because government research does not require results in order to get money. This idea says you have to achieve the objective or you do not get the money.

Senator Coburn Touts McCain's Health Care Plan (MSNBC 06/24/08 4:00pm)
REPORTER: John McCain is willing to give some people up to $5,000 in tax credits to pay for health insurance but the national coalition on health care says it can cost a family a four up to $12,000, that's a big gap, especially in these economic times. What do you make of that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TOM COBURN: Well, I think it's only one part of his plan. Remember our biggest problem is the 75% of the dollars we spend on health care on chronic diseases. And a key component of his plan is to emphasize prevention and put the dollars into prevention so that 10 years down the road, or 15 years down the road, we're not spending 75% of the money on treating chronic diseases, we will have prevented a large number of those.

So the problem is not that we don't have enough money in health care, the problem is that only about 2/3 of it actually gets spent on health care preventing some disease or helping somebody get well. So the idea of allowing those people, who no longer have, who have no access to health care, to start along that plan. He also has a plan to tapper the eligibility on Medicaid, so you don't have an abrupt drop with Medicaid [...].

One of the thing that's happened with health care is the market place isn't working. And it's because we're mandating it through bureaucracies and insurance companies and putting them in between the patient and their doctor. And what Senator McCain's plan will do is put the actual patient and doctor back together and give them incentives to go do it efficiently and with great quality outcomes [...]

Rachel Maddow Reminds Viewers of McCain's Public Finance Troubles (MSNBC 06/24/08 6:38pm)
DAVID GREGORY: […] McCain wants to keep this [public financing] issue alive. Does it resonate?

RACHEL MADDOW: I think that it resonated for a while. I think it is a mistake to keep pushing this because, if he keeps pushing this, if he literally tries to get this out on television—right now, as far as I know it's just on the web—ultimately it's gonna come back to bite him because has his own problems on public financing. I mean, McCain is the one who said he would take public financing during the primary campaign and then, at the last minute, decided no, no, no.

He didn't want to take that public financing even though he received loans, at least, partially and allegedly on the basis of the collateral that he was going to get from taking public financing. I mean, he's been back and forth on this issue himself to the point that he's being sued by the democratic party for his stance on it during the primaries. I mean, he's sort of on the moral high ground here, but it's tenuous and I think it's weird for him to push this hard.

TONY BLANKLEY: […] The issue regarding McCain had to do with a lack of a quorum on the election committee because the democrats wouldn't confirm Bush's nominees. That's a very messy issue. This is a nice clean one and it's regarding Obama who says he's above politics.

MADDOW: Tony, [McCain] did change his mind, though.

WOLF BLITZER: […] John McCain right now. He's trying to put a bigger spotlight on his energy plan with help from California's larger than life Governor. That would be Arnold Schwarzenegger.

ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER: I have every confidence that once McCain is in the Whitehouse America will get back in the game of having a sensible, consistent and forward looking energy policy.

BLITZER: But there were some bumps in the McCain- Schwarzenegger road show today. Including protests and a biting response from Barack Obama. […]

DANA BASH: John McCain got a big boost from somebody who is incredibly important. Perhaps the most important Republican for John McCain when it comes to the issue of the environment. Which is obviously is one of the big issues he is trying to use to separate himself from President Bush and make himself out as a different kind of Republican.

The problem […] they do differ on something that really has bubbled up and really exploded as a potential problem for McCain in that road for him that he is trying to take as a different kind of Republican. And that problem is offshore drilling. Clearly Arnold does differ with McCain on that issue. They didn't talk about it today but it was really interesting Wolf, there was some open disagreement from one other member of the panel […] challenged him not only on offshore drilling but nuclear policy. So it was kind of the straight talk that McCain says he likes. […] There were also some protestors outside. […]

Schwarzenegger Remains Quiet While Protestors and Environmental Experts in California Reject McCain's Energy Proposals (CNN 06/24/08 08:03pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: 83% of American's now feel the cost of gasoline is either a major problem or a crisis. But its not just gas […] everything at the grocery store costs more. […] Whatever you're shopping for, its delivered by truck and truckers say the price of diesel is driving them out of business […] But if you think drilling for more oil is the answer, the scientist that warned us about global warming 20 years ago has a scary new message.

JAMES HANSEN: We really have reached a point of a planetary emergency. The things we hear being said now by Congress and by the President for that matter, to go drill for the last drop of oil in the continental shelf. It's exactly the wrong thing to do. In the process it guarantees that we pass the tipping point.

BROWN: Today John McCain went to California to try a tricky two step. He again called for offshore oil drilling while at the same time saying we got to do more for the environment and global warming. […] He had some high profile help; he also had no shortage of critics.

DANA BASH: A joint appearance with Arnold Schwarzenegger and an environmental plug from California's green Republican Governor. […] McCain tried to live up to that […]

JOHN MCCAIN: I propose to put the purchasing power of the United States government on the side of green technology.

[Clip of Protestors]

BASH: Outside the event protesters decrying McCain's new position supporting offshore drilling as a way to ease gas prices. An unpopular move in California. Schwarzenegger strongly opposes McCain on the issue, and an advisor told CNN the Governor planned to make that very clear today, but instead Schwarzenegger largely kept quiet. Still McCain got an ear full on offshore drilling from another invited guest.

MICHEAL FEENEY: It would be 12, 15 maybe 20 years before those resources came on line and got to full production. That's not going to impact the price of gasoline anytime soon.

BASH: Later McCain tried to clarify his position by saying states should decide whether to drill off their shores.

OBAMA: John McCain still doesn't get it.

BASH: Barack Obama seized on something McCain said yesterday. McCain was asked just how long it would take before offshore drilling actually started to lower gas prices.

MCCAIN: It may take some years. The fact that we are exploiting those reserves would have a psychological effect that I think would be beneficial.

OBAMA: A psychological effect. In case you're wondering, in Washington speak that means it polls well.

BASH: Obama also mocked McCain's idea for a $300 million cash prize for inventing an alternative car battery.

OBAMA: When John F. Kennedy decided we were going to put a man on the moon he didn't put a bounty out for some rocket scientist to win.

BASH: In response McCain pressed a new campaign theme. Obama is Dr. No.

MCCAIN: He talks the talk but has not walked the walk. And on this energy issue, yea it's easy to say no to everything. That's what Senator Obama's doing.

The report that Boehner will announce a new investigation can actually help a lot. Interested to see more about that. Cummings said on CBS today that she wants the Committee to release her emails but did not present it as news and no press has noticed. I am trying to reach Cummings staff to get more background and determine how we lift that up tonight and the am. But if Boehner does go investigative route - we have great response on making emails public now, not creating some new investigation. We can also get our Hill tv surrogates like Boxer, Schiff, Schumer out.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.
Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.
Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.
Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.
Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

The draft BSA lays the foundation for leaving U.S military forces in Afghanistan after the end of 2014. It is expected to involve 8,000 to 10,000 U.S. troops with counterterrorism, training, and other responsibilities in support of Afghan forces.

So the stakes are high -- for Afghanistan, and for preserving the investment of lives and treasure that the United States and its coalition allies have made over the last twelve years.

Initially President Karzai said he would sign the BSA after its approval by a traditional convocation of Afghan leaders called a Loya Jirga. The BSA received overwhelming approval, But Karzai nonetheless declined to sign. He has required further concessions: an end to counterterrorism raids into Afghan homes at night, active U.S. support for the peace process with the Taliban, and non-interference in the April election to choose President Karzai's successor. Lately he has threatened not to sign at all and to leave it to his successor.

U.S. officials have responded by pressuring President Karzai directly and indirectly and setting a succession of missed deadlines, most recently saying that the BSA must be signed in "weeks, not months." So far, nothing has worked. U.S. officials need an alternative approach.

One option would be for President Obama to make a public statement along the following lines.

First, he would praise Afghanistan's progress in assuming greater responsibility for its security, in improving the education, health, and well-being of its citizens, and in preparing for the upcoming Presidential election. He would state that, to support that progress, he has directed U.S. forces to curtail all but essential night raids, he is committed to facilitating the peace process, and pledges full support for an April election free from all outside influences.

These statements would not represent a major U.S. policy change, but together they would offer President Karzai a face saver if in fact he wishes to sign the BSA.

Second, President Obama would announce the specific number of troops that he is prepared to leave in Afghanistan post-2014 and direct the Pentagon to develop plans on that basis. He would call on our NATO allies to announce similar force commitments.

This step would go a long way to reassuring the candidates for the Afghan Presidency and the Afghan people of America's post-2014 presence. The lack of such reassurance has become a source of serious instability, threatening the success of the Afghan election and the morale of the Afghan security forces. For similar reasons, President Obama should resist any pressure to set at this point a date for the termination of the U.S. post-2014 deployment.

Third, President Obama would state that while he is willing to sign the BSA with President Karzai, he is also willing to sign it post-April with a new Afghan President. U.S. officials should then stop pressuring President Karzai -- or anyone else -- for a signature before the April election. Such pressure only strengthens President Karzai's hand, encourages further delay, and makes the United States look weak and desperate.

President Obama should make clear in his statement that his troop commitment is dependent upon the ultimate signature of the BSA. But a post-election April or May signing by a new Afghan president would give more than enough time to complete the necessary U.S. military planning before the end of the year. Indeed, informed experts say that even without the BSA, U.S. forces could remain in Afghanistan after 2014 under the existing Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) (although our allies would have to negotiate a new SOFA for their forces with the new Afghan government).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recent polling suggests that over 60% of the American people believe the Afghan war was not worth fighting. But the same poll suggests that 55% support leaving some U.S. forces for training and "anti-insurgency" operations. And public statements by members suggest that a post-2014 deployment would have bipartisan Congressional support.

President Obama should avoid any suggestion that he might embrace a "zero option" and leave no U.S. troops post-2014. Almost every Afghan expert believes it would destabilize Afghanistan, place the Presidential election in doubt, and ultimately risk the collapse of the Afghan security forces. It would profoundly affect U.S. security interests. Afghanistan would become once again a safe haven for terrorists -- who, history shows, would ultimately attack U.S. interests and territory. Afghanistan would contribute to destabilizing a nuclear-armed Pakistan. And the Afghan people would forfeit all the progress they have made (with our help) in building a more tolerant, inclusive, secure, and prosperous society.

There are less than three months to go before elections to replace President Karzai. U.S. policy must not be based on frustration with Karzai's mercurial behavior. It must be based on ensuring the election of a legitimate successor to President Karzai with whom the United States can sign a BSA that is overwhelmingly in the interests of both countries."

All -- That's it. May be a little long for you but Autumn has shown great skill in helping to shrink my stuff without losing the substance. And I will help. At the same time, the subject is important enough to warrant an extended treatment.

Thank you for your consideration.

FULL REMARKS
Thank you all very much. I appreciate the hospitality of the Harry Truman Library Institute. I'm honored to be here in the town that sent Harry Truman to Washington, and the town that welcomed him back when his work was done.

- [ad libs]: before i go much further, i admire much about Truman. 1 among many, incl. his honesty and candor , was his willingness and understanding that the War in Korea could not be abandoned, even in the face of overwhelming public opinion to the contrary. truman had the courage to fire one of the most popular military figures in US history and he "stayed the course"

He was a man of principle, of wisdom and a deep and abiding love for our country. His accomplishments in war and peace are among the most significant of any president in the Twentieth Century. He succeeded beyond everyone's expectations – perhaps, even his own – because every day Harry Truman woke up determined to put his country before party and self-interest. We would all be better public servants and the country would be better served if we tried a little more often to keep the example of this good American before us.

President Truman was a student of history, and he knew how suddenly a crisis could come about. And while so many things have changed in the 35 years since his passing, Harry Truman would surely recognize the sources of the financial crisis that now threaten the livelihoods of millions and the future of the entire American economy. Only the vast sums of money would surprise him. But the costs of unbridled greed on Wall Street, the foolishness of politicians who fed the problem, and the recklessness of politicians who failed to meet the crisis – all of these would have a familiar feel to the man from Independence.

We are square in the greatest financial crisis of our lifetimes. And I am pleased to report that today, I will be returning to the floor of the Senate to vote on a bill that marks a decisive step in the right direction. The original proposal was flawed. I urged additions of taxpayer protections, stronger oversight, limitations on executive compensation and more protections for people's bank accounts. I am pleased that these are being added to improve the original bill. It took Congress a while, and there were costs to these delays. But they have awakened to the danger. And today, with the unity that this crisis demands, Congress will once again work to restore confidence and stability to the American economy.

There will be a time to fix the blame for all that has happened – especially in the case of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, and the abuses and political deal-making that corrupted those institutions. But our duty right now is to fix the problem, and that is the business that will shortly take me back to Washington. Following September 11th, our national leaders came together at a time of crisis. Now, with this measure, we have another chance to come together to prove that Washington is once again capable of leading this country.

If the financial rescue bill fails in Congress yet again, the present crisis will turn into a disaster. As credit disappears, students will no longer be able to get loans for college, and families looking for a new home will be unable to get a loan. New car sales will come to a halt. Businesses will have difficulty securing credit for operations and may be unable to pay employees. If we fail to act, the gears of our economy will grind to a halt.

This is a moment of great testing. At such moments, there are those on both sides of this debate who will act on principle. Of course, there are always some who think first of their own interests, who calculate their own advantage instead of rushing to the aid of their country. But in the case of this bill, I am confident there are enough people of good will in both parties to help see America through this crisis. And when the last vote is cast, we can be grateful to all of them – Democrats and Republicans alike – for helping to solve the crisis instead of merely exploiting it.

Crises often have a way of revealing our better selves – of showing what we are made of, and how much we can achieve when we are put to the test. This is true as well of the grave challenges we face in Washington. Yet it should not require extreme emergencies – when the future of our entire economy is on the line – to bring out the best in us, or to bring us together in service to the common good. We are supposed to do that even in the calmest of times. And if we worked together more often in that spirit, perhaps there would be fewer crises, close-calls, and near-disasters confronting our nation.

Just consider the day-to-day routine of Congress – even as the 110th Congress ends, there remains a long list of challenges unmet. Congress has failed to pass many of the appropriations bills funding the regular business of our government. From agriculture to the labor department to transportation, the majority of appropriations bills have not passed. Even funding for the operations of the legislative branch itself has not passed. Congress can't even find agreement on the yearly bill to pay for the Congress itself.

And while these routine funding issues are addressed at the last minute behind closed doors, the big challenges facing our country continue to languish. We still have made no progress to resolving our energy crisis. While we seek solutions to the economic crisis we face today, Washington has been ineffective in addressing the housing crisis that started it. And in the face of mounting job losses, we still have not taken action to put our economy back on track with policies that would encourage job creation, or with updates to an unemployment system and job training programs that were created for the 1950s.

Our government is on the wrong track, our economy is struggling, and I expect we will receive more bad news with Friday's unemployment report. It is a time for leadership and a plan to create jobs and get our country on the right track.

I believe in low taxes; spending discipline, and open markets. I believe in rewarding hard work and letting people keep the fruits of their labor. We will keep the current low tax rates. We will simplify the current tax code. We will double the child exemption from 3500 dollars to 7000 dollars. We will give every family a 5000 dollar tax credit to buy their own health insurance or keep their current plan, and we will open up the national health-care market to expand choices and improve quality. And my administration will reduce the price of food by eliminating the subsidies for ethanol and agricultural goods. These subsidies inflate the price of food, not only for Americans but for people in poverty across the world, and I propose to abolish them.

I believe in a government that unleashes the creativity and initiative of Americans, so they can create more jobs and keep our economy growing. So we will cut business taxes from 35 percent to 25 percent, to give American businesses a new edge in competition. We will spur new investment through R&D tax credits and expensing of equipment. And we will protect the right of workers to decide for themselves, by democratic vote, whether to unionize.

Keeping taxes low helps small businesses grow and create new jobs. Cutting the second highest business tax rate in the world will help American companies compete and keep our best jobs from moving overseas. Doubling the child tax exemption will improve the lives of millions of American families at a time when the cost of living is rising. Reducing government spending and getting rid of failed programs will let you keep more of your own money to save, spend and invest as you see fit. Opening new markets for our goods and preparing workers to compete in the world economy is essential to our future prosperity.

As president, I will also set this country on the straightest, swiftest path to energy independence. As a nation, we will embark on the most ambitious national project in decades. We are going to stop sending $700 billion a year to countries that don't like us very much. We will attack the problem on every front. We will produce more energy at home. We will drill new wells offshore, and we'll drill them now. We will build more nuclear power plants. We will develop clean coal technology. We will increase the use of wind, tide, solar and natural gas. We will encourage the development and use of flex fuel, hybrid and electric automobiles. And in all of this, we will create millions of new jobs, many in industries that will be the engine of our future prosperity – jobs that will be there when your children enter the workforce.

Some still insist that we can achieve energy independence without more drilling and without more nuclear power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Americans know better than that. We must use all resources and develop all technologies necessary to rescue our economy from the damage caused by rising oil prices and to restore the health of our planet. It's an ambitious plan, but Americans are ambitious by nature, and we have faced greater challenges. It's time for us to show the world again how Americans lead.

As president, I will also act immediately with reforms to restore fairness, integrity, and financial sanity to the institutions that have failed us on Wall Street. We will apply new rules to Wall Street, to end the frenzies of speculation by people gaming the system, and to make sure that this present crisis is never repeated. We will bring regulatory agencies built for the 1930s into the 21st century. On my watch, the rules will be enforced, and violations will be prosecuted. And there will be new rules to shrink, sell, and clean house at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

We must also realize that this rescue plan has serious implications for future spending. We cannot dedicate [possibly] more than a trillion dollars to rescue failing institutions, and then go right back to business as usual in Washington – as if there were no end to the resources of government or to the patience of taxpayers. Therefore, as president, I will impose a one-year spending freeze on every agency of the federal government, excepting only national defense, the care of our veterans, and a few critical priorities. Leadership requires candor. And I will tell you bluntly that America is already ten trillion dollars in debt, and to make our economy strong again we must reduce the burden of federal spending. We cannot tax our way to prosperity. I am committed to billions in spending reductions that will balance the budget, and get us on the path away from ruinous debt.

The constant partisan rancor that stops us from solving these problems in Washington isn't a cause, it's a symptom. It's what happens when people go to Washington to work for themselves and not you.

Again and again, I've worked with members of both parties to fix problems that need to be fixed. That's how I will govern as president. I will reach out my hand to anyone to help me get this country moving again. I have that record and the scars to prove it.

I offer this not just as a campaign slogan, but as the way to solve our country's problems. Instead of rejecting good ideas because we didn't think of them first, let's use the best ideas from both sides. This great country can do anything we put our minds to. I will ask Democrats and Independents to serve with me. And my administration will set a new standard for transparency and accountability. We're going to finally start getting things done for the people who are counting on us, and I won't care who gets the credit.

That is the spirit of can-do patriotism, Harry Truman, that humble, good man from Independence, Missouri, brought to the presidency. When, to his and everyone's surprise, he assumed the office of the President and the mantle of leader of the free world, he faced the grave and difficult decisions that would end the World War and remake the world out of its ashes.

Subject: Re: [AGENDA & MEMO] Friday Strategy Call at 8:00 AM ET

Good morning,

Below please find background on fundraiser press for discussion on this morning's call.

Fundraiser Cell Phone/Press Access

Upcoming finance events

three events in NY (4/28) three events in DC (4/30)

three dates in LA and three dates in SF will be announced soon.

All events are large receptions 150-300 people in private homes, all will include a 50 person clutch with photo line beforehand.

the finance team also told me they will be doing a ton of grassroots fundraisers in cities across the country where tickets are $20- if people are going to start writing up the big fancier ones it could be helpful to get these events out there as well.

Recommendation: Establish 2 types of fundraising events, small (under 60 people) which will be closed to press and phones can be taken. Large events where phones will not be taken and we will have a print pooler. In addition to increasing access, an added benefit of having a pooler there is that donors will leak some of what HRC says to the press anyway, and it will likely be inaccurate.

Below is a rundown of what others have been doing on press access at fundraisers.

There have been no public reports about cell phones being confiscated so either it isn't happening or donors aren't leaking (my guess is the former). I have some concerns about collecting everyone's phones at a 200+ person event. It goes beyond what POTUS does and seems more than likely that one of the donors will talk to the press and it will continue the extreme secrecy storyline.

Yahoo: Obama campaign nixes cell phones at some fundraisers

Time: Obama Campaign Bans Cell Phones at Private Fundraisers

POTUS/FLOTUS

At DNC fundraisers cell phones are confiscated for events with under 60 people (essentially whenever there is Q and A and not just prepared remarks.)

Press Access- when over approx. 60ppl they are pooled for print press, smaller events are closed (DNC got A LOT of pushback for this, some from WHCA)

For FLOTUS we select one local print reporter to pool the event.

GOP 2016ers

Jeb Bush

Jeb held an open press fundraiser in Tallahassee prior to his speech to his foundation promising to be transparent. He also allowed reporters into a house party in NH. It doesn't seem like reporters are generally let in though.

"The New York events follow a Bush super PAC fundraiser in Tallahassee, Florida that included several hundred of the state's top donors and fundraisers. The event was also open to reporters, part of Bush's effort to run a more transparent presidential campaign." [Politico, 2/10/15]

"Aside from the press attention, Bush's trip to New Hampshire was fairly low key. He held no big, open-to-the-public events, only visiting a bioscience company in Hudson and attending a house party in Dover. He took questions during a roundtable event at the local company and again from attendees at the house party, hosted at the home of former New Hampshire GOP chairman Fergus Cullen." [CNN, 3/14/15]

- "His other appearances on Friday and Saturday, which included a fundraiser for Rep. Frank Guinta and meetings with New Hampshire leaders, were all private." [CNN, 3/14/15]

NJ: Jeb Bush's Team Is Taping His Private Events 'As Much As Possible'

Chris Christie

I haven't seen anything about formalized rules, but the vast majority of them have been closed to the press.

Ted Cruz

No specific rules or restrictions that I've seen yet. So far I've only seen dates reported but no stories of reporters getting denied access as of yet.

Rand Paul

Rand's private fundraisers are generally closed press. Occasionally when he does closed press events he'll have one friendly reporter there ie Matt Boyle

The Jesse Benton Resignation Because "Private Fundraisers Are Not Routinely Covered By The Media." "Rand Paul, of Bowling Green, has not commented about [Jesse] Benton's resignation from the McConnell campaign. Paul was scheduled to host a fundraiser Tuesday afternoon at Forcht Bank in Lexington's Hamburg Place for Republican state House candidate Ken Kearns, who is trying to defeat Democratic incumbent Susan Westrom. The Kearns campaign said last Friday that media could attend the event but on Monday said the event had been closed to the media, at Paul's request. The Kearns campaign gave no reason Paul, who generally is talkative to reporters, did not want the media to attend. Paul spokesman Dan Bayens said Tuesday that Paul is 'most accessible to the media but he's doing a series of fundraisers that were billed as private. Private fundraisers are not routinely covered by the media.'" [Lexington Herald-Leader, 9/2/14]

Marco Rubio

I haven't seen anything on Rubio's fundraisers being open to the press.

Scott Walker

Hasn't announced his run yet so slightly more difficult but it appears his fundraisers have been closed press.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 08/12/08

Main Topic: Georgia War

Summary of Shift: The three networks led with coverage of the surprise cease-fire announced today by the Russian President. Despite this shift, pockets of violence are being reported throughout Georgia, and the question of how long Russian soldiers will remain in occupation lingers. Olbermann highlighted McCain's mispronunciation of the Georgian President's name, the exploitation of the war as a campaign tactic, the shallowness of McCain's appeal on the issue, and finally the conflict of interest Randy Scheunemann poses as a former lobbyist for Georgia. Olympic coverage still dominated the cycle with some concerns about swimsuit technology artificially allowing athletes to shatter world records. In domestic news, Nancy Pelosi signaled that she may allow a vote on offshore drilling, oil prices are down while food and shipping prices steadily rise, continued coverage of the leaked HRC strategy memos, and more segments on backyard oil millionaires in North Dakota.

Highlights:
1. FNC: McCain uses Georgian War to Distance Himself from Bush
2. FNC: Pawlenty Emphasizes 'Party of Ideas' brand for GOP
3. ABC: McCain has better record of bipartisanship than Obama
4. MSNBC: Fineman Highlight's McCain's Adoption of Mark Penn Strategy To Portray Obama As Foreign
5. MSNBC: Maddow and Olbermann Discuss McCain's Crass Exploitation Of Georgian War, Conflict of Interest, Shallow Appeals

Clips:

Highlight #1
John McCain uses Georgian Distance Himself from President Bush (FNC 08/12/08 07:05pm)
SHEPHARD SMITH: Now John McCain says Georgia is at a strategic crossroads, and he's calling on Russia again to withdraw those troops. McCain says he's talked to Georgia's President and told him the United States will support what he calls this little tiny democracy.

JOHN MCCAIN: And I told him that I know I speak for every American when I say to him, today we are all Georgian.

CARL CAMERON: Well he says he's been talking to Saakashvili everyday since the Russian invasion began on Friday. And he made the point that he thinks the Bush administration probably underestimated Russia's expansionist intentions and ambitions throughout the region, and specifically drew differences with himself and President Bush on foreign policy and how trustworthy the President thought Vladimir Putin is.

MCCAIN: I don't know if the President quote, missed the boat, but I do believe the President isn't, probably had a higher opinion of Vladimir Putin than I do.

CAMERON: McCain suggested that Russia did score a victory here and the US relationship will be affected for years.

SMITH: Politics entering this of course. And some Republicans have said that Obama's response to the crisis hasn't been as strong as McCain's. What does McCain have to say about that?

CAMERON: Well he is having none of that, while his aides suggest that Senator McCain has greater experience. When I talk to the Arizona Senator about it today, he was not going to criticize; saying now is the time to sort of leave partisanship at the waters edge if you will. He pulled his punches:

MCCAIN: I respect Senator Obama's views and I believe that it's important that we act in a bipartisan fashion now. There's no room for partisanship now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CAMERON: He's called him naive and inexperienced in the past.

Highlight #2

Tim Pawlenty: The Republican Party Needs to be a Party of Ideas, and John McCain has Ideas (FNC 08/11/08 05:16pm)

HEATHER NAUERT: […] what is a Sam's Club Republican. Who are these folks, Governor, and why do you believe that the Republican Party is losing what you call Sam's Club Republican's.

TIM PAWLENTY: In short, the Republican Party needs to do a better job of reaching out to different groups than just our traditional groups. And one of those is people who might shop at a place like Sam's Club or Target or Costco. They are looking for value, they don't necessarily have more money to spend, but they want to make sure they get good value for what they have. So living within their means, making sure government lives within its means might be one of the measurements for them and what they're looking for in a candidate. […] I think the Republican Party needs to get back to being a party of ideas and enthusiasm that will help people where their real needs are and where their real concerns are. And I don't think we've done as good of a job in that in recent years as we could.

NAUERT: Ok it sounds like you are talking about some of these Reagan democrats of the 80's that John McCain is of course hoping to bring into the party. But you know a lot of conservatives feel that the Republican Part has really gotten off course, there's too much government spending. What do you say to those conservatives who are uncertain about the direction of the Republican Party today?

PAWLENTY: […] We need to be the party that says all right if government isn't going to deal with these things then what are our ideas to make sure peoples needs and concerns can get addressed. […] Well maybe Senator McCain's idea for a tax cut to allow people to purchase their own heath insurance would be the way to go. It would be one example of not building a government bureaucracy. […]

NAUERT: […] Tell us what you would bring to John McCain's team?

PAWLENTY: Well I don't talk about the vice president's stuff. […] In general Senator McCain is going to have some great people to look at. He has so many strengths, such a strong leader in his own right that I think he's going to look for somebody who strengthens him in some geographic or policy consideration. Somebody who shares his views and maybe his outlook for the country from a philosophical direction. […]

NAUERT: […] But it is said that you two share a close relationship and a really a political style that is the same.

PAWLENTY: Well I think Senator McCain is a leader of enormous courage and epic abilities. I think the country is calling him out, they need somebody like him. I think he is going to be a fantastic President for the United States of America

ABC World News: John McCain has a Better Record of Bipartisanship Then Barack Obama (ABC 08/12/08 06:49pm)

JAKE TAPPER: In York, PN, John McCain was introduced by Joe Lieberman, who calls himself an Independent Democrat.

JOE LIEBERMEN: It's great to be here with Rocky McCain.

TAPPER: 13% of Democrats support McCain. […]

JOHN MCCAIN: I just want to say I have a record of reaching across the aisle, of reaching across the aisle and working with my friends, whether it be Joe Lieberman or Ted Kennedy.

TAPPER: McCain has broken with his party on controversial issues such as campaign finance reform, global warming and most recently immigration reform, his support for which almost cost him the Republican nomination. In the Senate, Obama has teamed up with Republican's […] but nothing that has caused him any real political trouble.

Howard Fineman Highlights Strategy Of Portraying Obama As The Other, Non-American (MSNBC 08/12/08 8:02pm)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOWARD FINEMAN: Well McCain didn't so much just wrap himself in the flag in York today, he was in it tighter than one of those swimmers in the Olympics in those new bathing suits. I mean they not only did the pledge of allegiance, and the star spangled banner, they did God Bless America, again they did a whole number of things to try emphasize in York, Pennsylvania this old colonial town in East Central Pennsylvania the America theme that John McCain is running on. And I was there when Joe Lieberman introduced him and said you know we want one guy who puts America first and reaches across party lines and one guy who does not. And it struck me as fighting words for sure. And it'll be interesting what if anything the Obama campaign does about it.

KEITH OLBERMANN: […] Isn't this all 6 inches away from being racism?

FINEMAN: […] It's about the idea of mystery and difference. It can take all kinds of forms. It can take allegations of elitism, it can take allegations of religious background, race may be part of it, I stil don't think if you asked McCain flat out if you agree with this kind of messaging that he would necessarily approve of it or support it. But there's no doubt that that's the implication of what Lieberman said and what Mark Penn's memos are about. As you pointed out Keith, Hawaii is part of the United States.

Maddow and Olberman Discuss McCain's Political Exploitation Of Georgian Crisis, Lobbyist Ties, Focus On Oil And Religion Rather Than Civilian Deaths (MSNBC 08/12/08 8:22pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: […] Could someone tried to have looked slightly like they were not exploiting Georgia for political gain?

RACHEL MADDOW: What a handy little war this has turned out to be, right? […] For all the political celebrating, you could hardly make out the dead civilians here.

OLBERMANN: Two of the McCain stated reasons for protecting Georgia: Christ and Oil. Apart from it sounding more and more Goldwaterian here, these are good enough reasons to reignite the Cold War?

MADDOW: Him and what army? We're not going to go to war with Russia any time soon. I mean obviously Russia is way out of line and Russia under Putin is not only a threat to that region but a threat to the global order of things and it's a scary thing. There's two ways to approach that. You either invade Moscow or you try to unite the world and unite NATO even in opposition to what Russia is doing. You don't do that by taking off your shoe and banging pounding it on the podium and saying 'I'll get you Russia my foreign policy guy is a registered lobbyist for your country, the country that you just invade.' That's not the way you move things forward in the same way.

OLBERMANN: By the way how is that not a big front page conflict of interest in the middle of what apparently a shooting war?

MADDOW: Randy Scheunemann, top foreign policy aide to John McCain, til March the registered agent of the government of Georgia, one of the two parties involved here. And McCain coming out here bellicose as all get out on wading into this conflict essentially with talking points that were bought and paid for by one of the governments that is party to this conflict. If you want to look like an honest broker, that is not the way to do it. You don't take Randy Scheunemann out on the campaign trail with you to show off your lobbyists.

OLBERMANN: And having briefed the reporters on the plane coming back from Pennsylvania. 100 years in Iraq or a month, we've heard that. 100 or a month with the bomb bomb bomb Iran song, now this garbage between Russia and Georgia and it's exploitation by the McCain campaign. You use the word bellicose. It seems worse than that. More bellicose than what Bush and Cheney put out for 8 years.

My only question - whether we lean into "the presidency is not an entry level position" - and push off from it, or just let that part go.

DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

CGI at the forefront of virtual reality

Tech Insider covered CGI's virtual reality film "Inside Impact: East Africa." Viewers are "virtually" transported to East Africa, where they see how CGI commitments are improving thousands of lives. > "There are so many great CGI commitments that highlight how investing in girls and women translates into better communities and stronger economies. One commitment that comes to mind focuses on collaboratively building a more effective channel to identify high-potential women entrepreneurs and develop them into strong corporate suppliers."

Hult Prize winners work to improve access to early childhood education

Forbes covered this year's Hult Prize winner, which was announced at the 2015 CGI Annual Meeting. The winning team's unique model improves access to early childhood education around the world.

> "Prudot sees the problem this way, 'Over 100 million children under the age of six are living in underserved communities and do not have access to quality early childhood education. This situation leads to children being unprepared to enter primary school and with a weaker social and emotional foundation, thus making it more challenging for the youth to thrive and become productive members of society.'
> Prudot led the formation of a team of student entrepreneurs in Taiwan, where he attends business school at National Chengchi University. The team launched IMPCT, which operates Playcares.com, and competed in and won the 2015 Hult Prize competition at the Clinton Global Initiative last month."

CGI Commitment to Action supports working families

As part of a CGI Commitment to Action, Stonyfield joined the Working Parent Support Coalition. The coalition, made up of several corporations, will work to develop best practices in supporting working parents.

> "The announcement was part of a broader initiative of Stonyfield's parent company, French-based Danone. Danone is part of the newly announced Clinton Global Initiative's Working Parent Support Coalition that includes the U.S.-based divisions and subsidiaries of Barclays, Ernst & Young, KKR and Nestle. The coalition will share best practices and make policy adjustments to support mothers and working families... Each company has made their own pledge, their own commitment, to in some way help support women in the workplace."

McCain Accused of Being Wrong on All Sides on Immigration (CNN, 06/23/08, 6:57am)
KIRAN CHETRTY: […] Some conservatives say they are outraged by what they are saying is John McCain's flip-flopping on immigration. They're accusing him of pandering to Latinos for votes. Our next guest says there are two John McCain's when it comes to immigration. […] Rosanna, let me start with you because you were invited to this closed door session with McCain as well as with some other Hispanic leaders last week. You're a Mexican-American and you're also conservative, and you're saying that meeting, or what you heard him say at that meeting was upsetting. Explain.

ROSANNA PULIDO: Absolutely, because John McCain one day said, "I got it. I understand that people, American citizens want enforcement first. But the truth is if you look at John McCain's voting record, as far as illegal immigration, it's terrible. And to come into a group, and his mantra that evening was that he assured us that he would urge Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform. Well, that's not what I came to hear. And John McCain is just another politician that acts like he was elected to represent the Mexican government, not the citizens of America.

CHETRY: […] What is it that you want to hear from him? Don't we need some sort of reform when it comes to immigration in our country?

PULIDO: We need enforcement. We need comprehensive immigration enforcement of our laws.

CHETRY: And hasn't he said that he would do that?

PULIDO: Not when he's talking comprehensive immigration reform which is really a code word for amnesty. John McCain acts like there's two choices, mass deportation or mass legalization. What Americans want is intrition through enforcement.

CHETRY: […] Is John McCain finding himself in a no-win situation when it comes to immigration?

LESLIE SANCHEZ: No, I think that John McCain took his lumps when it comes to immigration reform. Especially with respect to conservatives, making sure their voices are heard on this issue. If you look back to last summer, this issue was one of the few that basically destroyed the campaign. Three quarters, it basically went bankrupt. It lost three quarters of the staff, and had to rebuild. And I think if you listen to the rhetoric that John McCain put forward, he says, I stridently worked with Kennedy on comprehensive immigration reform. Not through any fault of his own, or any republicans, but I would say a lot of fault does lay on the democrats, mud on both sides, that this did not move forward.

CHETRY: Is he saying one thing to the conservative republican voters, and one thing to Latinos when it comes to what he would do?

SANCHEZ: Kiran, absolutely not! I think what he is saying is exactly what's consistent. I spoke to the campaign yesterday about this particular meeting, it's consistent with everything else he says. He says I moved very forward with comprehensive immigration reform, it did not work, there was not this kind of sentiment in America for this type of movement. I understand now that we have to work on border enforcement first. And he's going to start with that, he is not going to move forward with a measure like McCain-Kennedy. He knows that didn't work. And I think that's what he's saying. The difference is he's saying there has to be some sort of compassionate realistic approach to what to do with the twelve million plus undocumented illegal's who are here.

CHETRY: […] He said that he would not again vote for his measure. He says that he understands that people want the borders secured first. What's wrong with that?

PULIDO: What's wrong with that is that he is a senator in a border state where we've had a massive flood of illegal aliens come into this country, he hasn't done anything to stop it, and now he's going to use it for his campaign saying I will close the border. What has he been doing all these years? Border security is not an immigration issue. Border security is a national security issue. Which he's failed.

Nancy Pfotenhauer Speaks on Finance Reform and Immigration Reform on Behalf of McCain (CNN, 6/23/08, 7:25am)

JOHN ROBERTS: John McCain and Barack Obama battling over money after Senator Obama opted out of public financing for the general election. What does the McCain side think about Senator Obama's move? […] She joins us now from McCain headquarters in Arlington, Virginia. Nancy, good to see you. There's been an awful lot of criticism of Senator Obama for this decision from the McCain campaign. Isn't that just because it puts Senator McCain at a distinct financial disadvantage?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I don't think so. This is something that both gentlemen said they would pursue because it was the right thing the do. I t was the right thing to do because pursuing public financing is a way of keeping corruption and special interest politics to a minimum. And the bottom line is that Obama broke his word to the American people. You know, it's easy -- doing the right thing is easy, it doesn't really test your character. It's doing the right thing when it's difficult that character is revealed. Juxtapose Obama who has a preacher's gift for a righteous statement but side steps like a politician when it's going to cost him anything, with John McCain. He wouldn't take the easy way out, even when his life was on the line as a prisoner of war and he was offered early release and special treatment and he refused to take it because that wasn't the right thing to do.

ROBERTS: Let me try to keep this focused on campaign financed. We had Robert Gibbs, the communications director from the Obama campaign on this program on Friday. He says that the McCain campaign uses financing, the public system only when it suits his purpose and that he's got his own problems when it comes to public versus private financing. Let's listen to what Robert Gibbs said.

[…] [Robert Gibbs Clip Shown]

So what he's talking about there, Nancy, is back in the early stages of the primary campaign when John McCain wasn't doing so well, it looked like he was going to take public financing and then when his poll numbers came up he decided to opt out. Then there was this idea of this line of credit for $4 million that he took and still some lingering questions over whether or not he used that as collateral for public financing. The FEC still wants to know about this and the democrats are going to re-file a lawsuit on that issue tomorrow morning. So what do you say about that?

PFOTENHAUER: Well, of course they are. That's the nature of politics. But you know, John, that there's a big difference between public financing at the primary level and the general election. People have acknowledged from both parties that the primary system is broken, if you will, from the standpoint of financing. And it was the people who were kind of the cream of the crop who are committing to public financing in the general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Obama said that he would aggressively pursue it and then threw it out the window the second it was inconvenient. It's bold talk, not bold actions. And frankly, it's bold actions that makes the man.

ROBERTS: There's another issue out there, Nancy, that we were talking about this morning, this idea of a meeting that Senator McCain had last week with a group of Hispanic voters, about 100 of them. One of the people who was there was Rosanna Pulito, who is a member of the Minutemen Organization. She accused him of pandering to Hispanic interests by saying at that meeting that he was going to push for comprehensive immigration reform. Let's listen to what she told us just a little white ago here.

[Pulito Clip Shown]

Is senator McCain, Nancy, throwing conservatives under the bus on this issue of immigration reform? He said during one of our debates that you've got to secure the borders first. Rosanna Pulito was accusing him of pandering to Hispanic voters.

PFOTENHAUER: She's also the only first who came out of that meeting makes the claim. I think Senator McCain, who has provided more day-to-day access to the media, he's on the record more than any presidential candidate in history, certainly in recent history, so he's not hiding what he has to say. He's made it clear that he heard from the American people that it's secure the borders first, but you don't stop once you secure the borders. We still then have to deal with the problem that we've got and the challenge of this nation.

ROBERTS: So he will push for comprehensive immigration reform?

PFOTENHAUER: He will secure the borders first and then continue to deal with the problem of immigration. He's never hidden from that at all. In fact, it's something that was the subject of quite a few debates during the primary season.

"Empathy is easy, investment is hard", McCain Called Out for Voting Record vs. Record Hypocrisy Over Levee Infrastructure (FNC, 06/23/08, 6:40am)

CHRIS GATES: […] John McCain can't have it both ways. Empathy is easy, investment is hard. You can't fly to Iowa, talk about how badly you feel, talk about how your heart goes out to all of them, and then have voted against funding for those levees, for those damns. The country has huge infrastructure needs and I think that's going to be a legitimate issue in the fall election.

Well I think the larger issue is, John McCain puts all of this kind of work in the category of pork barrel spending. And he says that any projects like these are wasteful pork barrel spending. I think people want a president that knows the difference between wise investment and pork barrel spending. And I think it's going to be a legitimate point of contention in the campaign.

Obama Accuses Phil Graham of Writing Enron Energy Loophole Legislation (FNC, 06/23/08, 6:48am)

KELLY WRIGHT: […] Obama says one of the lawmakers responsible for the Enron loophole, which was inserted into a bill some 8 years ago, was former republican Phil Graham of Texas, who is now an adviser to John McCain. Obama says as president, he would close the so called Enron loophole which he claims creates the climate for oil speculators to trade energy futures. Obama wants to close it, requiring future energy speculators to be regulated. […]

$300 Million Dollar Battery Prize Gets Mixed Reviews (MSNBC 06/23/08 7:15am)

Pawlenty Talks Mccain on Bush's Tax Cuts (CNN, 06/22/08, 12:07pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Joining us now from St. Paul, Minnesota, the site of this Summer's Republican National Convention is Minnesota's governor, Tim Pawlenty, he's the national co-chairman for the McCain campaign. He's also been mentioned frequently as a potential prospect for the vice presidential slot on the GOP ticket.

BLITZER: Here's some statistics that I'm sure you're familiar with. When president bush took office seven years ago, almost eight years ago . . . the national debt was around $5 trillion. It's now closer to $9 trillion with and it's going up. Senator Obama says if senator McCain has his way with the tax cuts he wants to make permanent, the Bush tax cuts which senator McCain originally opposed, that national debt is going to skyrocket

[. . .]

BLITZER: So Governor Pawlenty, you don't have a problem with allowing the Bush tax cuts that were implemented in 2001 and 2003 being made permanent, all the Bush tax cuts, the estate tax plus the tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans, including billionaires?

TIM PAWLENTY: They should have been permanent in the first place. The fact they're even having the debate, I think, is silly. But now that they're going to expire, I think they should continue. And keep in mind, when you talk about tax cuts for the wealthy, that involves these reductions in corporate taxes . . . Senator McCain understands that you cannot grow an economy by adding tax burdens on the people who invest, do research, build buildings, add jobs. . .

02242015 Lead On HRC Speech

Lead On: Watermark's Silicon Valley Conference for Women Hillary Rodham Clinton
Moderator: Kara Swisher
Santa Clara Convention Center, 5001 Great America Parkway, Santa Clara
February 24, 2015

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you so much! Hello. (Cheers, applause.) Wow, what an amazing crowd! (Cheers, applause.) It's great to be here. (Applause.) Thank you all so much. Thank you. Thank you. (Applause.)

I want to thank Renee for her introduction, but more than that, I want to thank her for what Intel is doing that she just described. And I hope that -- (cheers, applause) -- more companies will join with her and with Intel to really elevate this issue about diversity and inclusivity in the workforce here in Silicon Valley, and literally around our country.

I want to thank everyone at Watermark for organizing this terrific gathering and supporting such a vibrant, visionary community of women leaders here in the Bay Area, because you can just feel the energy. I love it. I was watching backstage when Brene Brown was speaking. Isn't she amazing, and the work that she's done, and the insights she provides? ? (Cheers, applause.)

So for 20 years Watermark has been helping people, women grow networks, gain skills, crack ceilings in technology, entrepreneurship and beyond. So really it's all of you who should be applauded for being part of this movement.

And I am delighted that I can be here for this first Lead On Conference. It's a great theme and a very important one, because we do need to lead. We have the information, we understand the challenge, and if there's any place in the world where Lead On should be happening, it's right here in a place of big dreams and transformational achievements, where a kid can have a good idea and then build a billion dollar company, in a place where faith in the future is so strong that it's taken as a given.

In fact, you all know Moore's Law, computer processors will keep doubling in power roughly every two years. Well, there's something very American about that kind of optimism. After all, our country is a great entrepreneurial experiment. Families like my grandparents who came to our shores with nothing but hope and a willingness to work hard, the pioneers who set out for California by wagon train, the patriots who dared imagine that a new nation could be built on the novel proposition that all of us are created equal.

And even though it's taken centuries to turn that idea into reality, and we're still not there, those dreamers and doers would have been right at home here, because the innovation and success we see around us is proof that progress is possible, but also that it is not inevitable, not in a life, not in a country. After all, Moore's Law doesn't tell the whole story. Those processors don't get smaller and more powerful on their own. That takes incredible effort and ingenuity. It takes people not only working hard but working together.

And America's prosperity and security are not inevitable either. We've learned that we can bounce back from some pretty tough blows. So we know that progress is possible if we as a country harness all our talents, find the best and freshest ideas, no matter where they come from, and grow together, lift each other up.

Today, I want to focus briefly on two areas where you know and I know there's much more work to be done, women in technology and technology and our broader economy.

Now, many of you in this audience know far more about those two areas than I do or ever will. You live it every day. You bump your heads on the glass ceilings that persist in the tech industry. You watch too many of your daughters and granddaughters get diverted away from careers in STEM.

As familiar as this story is, and we heard Renee summarizing it as she made the announcement about what Intel will try to do, it is still shocking, the numbers are sobering.

On the Forbes list of the top 100 venture investors in tech, only four are women. Just 11 percent of executives in Silicon Valley, and only about 20 percent of software developers overall are women.

One recent report on the gender pay gap in the Valley found that a woman with a bachelor's degree here tends to make 60 percent less than a man with the same degree.

And we can literally count on one hand the number of women who have actually been able to come here and turn their dream into billion dollar businesses.

And think of this: While nearly 60 percent of college graduates are now women, they earn only 18 percent of the computer science degrees. That's actually less than half of what it was in the 1980s when women earned 38 percent of those degrees. We are going backwards in a field that is supposed to be all about moving forward.

Women and girls remain underrepresented in STEM education more broadly, and with STEM jobs growing faster and paying more than many other fields, this puts our daughters and granddaughters at a disadvantage that can have lasting consequences for them, their families, and yes, our economy. I think the bottom line here is we cannot afford to leave all that talent sitting on the sidelines.

So to borrow a familiar phrase, it's time to think different. All of us in the private sector, government, the nonprofit world and education, we all have a stake in making this better, from the classroom to the boardroom.

I love the way Watermark supports a class at Stanford's Business School focused on women entrepreneurship.

I really appreciated when Google became the first big tech company to disclose the demographics of its tech workforce, 83 percent male, 17 percent female, 2 percent Latino, 1 percent black.

So there's a lot of entry points into tackling this problem. At the Clinton Foundation we're working with partners to recruit more STEM teachers for schools. We've also organized a series of code-a-thons to bring together young women software engineers to collaborate on new apps to promote women's health and wellness, while also building new professional networks for themselves.

And many of you are involved in other efforts to open avenues for women and people of color to participate and succeed in this industry, and we have to keep that work going and growing, because inclusivity is more than a buzzword or a box to check. It is a recipe for success in the 21st century. Bringing different perspectives and life experiences into corporate offices, engineering labs and venture funds is likely to bring fresh ideas and higher revenues.

And in our increasingly multicultural country, in an increasingly interdependent world, building a more diverse talent pool can't just be a nice to do for business, it has to be a must do.

Now, of course, the challenges we're talking about are by no means limited to the tech field. Less than 5 percent of all Fortune 500 CEOs are women. And women entrepreneurs often have a much harder time accessing capital to start or grow a business.

Up and down the ladder, many women are paid less for the same work, which is why I think we all cheered at Patricia Arquette's speech at the Oscars because she's right, it's time to have wage equality once and for all.

But it's not just wage equality. Many working parents all too often don't have access to commonsense benefits like sick days and paid leave that would allow them to balance work and family. (Applause.) I think we are embarrassed by, even shocked by the fact we are just one of nine countries in the entire world without national paid family leave.

Now, you may not realize that because here in California this state has had paid leave for 10 years. And the last time I looked, it seemed to work well for both businesses and families.

But even that is not a silver bullet. As Sheryl Sandberg and others have reminded us, even the professional women who have access to these basic benefits are often set back in their careers, in some cases simply for taking advantage of family leave or flexible schedules, and in others because of more subtle biases or attitudes in the workplace.

When I was a young lawyer and was pregnant, I worked in a small law firm and there was no family leave policy. It had never come up before. I was the first woman to be a partner in that law firm. So nobody said anything to me, and I didn't say anything to them; I just kept getting bigger and bigger and bigger. (Laughter.) And I'd walk down the halls and some of my partners would avert their eyes. They didn't know what to say to me. (Laughter.)

So when the time came and I went in and gave birth, the next morning, the lead partner called and he said two things. He said, "Congratulations, and when are you coming back to work?" (Laughter.) I said, "Well, thank you very much, maybe in four months." Pause. He goes, "Oh, okay." He had no idea. (Laughter.) I had no idea, but I was in a position where I could say, okay, four months.

And too many women even in those days, I can remember so well, they lost their jobs, they were marginalized, they were demoted for doing one of the most important jobs anybody in a society has, producing the next generation. (Applause.)

Even though things have changed in many places, not nearly enough and not everywhere, in so many ways our economy seems to still be operating like it's 1955.

And that's not just a problem for working women, it's a problem for everyone. Just think about all the hard working families that depend on two incomes to make ends meet. When one is shortchanged, the entire family suffers. In fact, more than 40 percent of mothers are now the sole or primary breadwinners for their families, and our economy depends on the strong participation by women.

Women moving into the workforce in large numbers helped drive a significant amount of America's economic growth over the past 40 years. Without that movement, the average American family would be earning $14,000 less today and our gross domestic product would be about $2 trillion smaller. So when women's participation is limited, our country's prosperity is limited, too.

And there are still too many women who want to work more and earn more, but are held back by outdated policies and pressures that hurt them, that hurt their families. That translates into more families struggling. We're just leaving that money, that growth on the table. And many families then can't afford their standard of living, they can't afford to get into and stay in the middle class.

And sometimes when I would go out and talk about women's issues, which I've done for decades, and particularly as Secretary of State when I said that it was the great unfinished business of the 21st century because the data on all of this is overwhelming, I could see men's eyes glaze over. I could see particularly foreign leaders but some Americans too saying, "Oh yeah, here she goes. Just look like you're concentrating." (Laughter.) "Act like you're listening and this too shall pass." (Laughter.)

But when we began using the economic data collected by, you know, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and a lot of other organizations, both public and private, and I could say, do you know how much money you're leaving on the table, do you know how much greater your economic growth and GDP could be if women were able to participate fully in the economy, because this great unfinished business of the 21st century really is moving toward the full participation of women and girls in every aspect of society all over the world.

That is a goal that has inspired me from the time I was an advocate for children and families through today, and which I took with me into the State Department, because I wanted it to be a priority of American foreign policy, because where women are included you're more likely to have democracy, you're more likely to have stability and prosperity. So it's not just a nice thing to do, it's important to our economic growth and our security.

And since leaving the government, I've worked on it at the Clinton Foundation with my daughter. And Chelsea and I are working with Melinda Gates and other partners on an initiative we call No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project. We're collecting the best data and research available on the gains women and girls have made around the world over the past 20 years, and the gaps that still remain. And we're looking at ways to accelerate progress in the years ahead.

Next month, we'll publish a sweeping global progress report full of data, designed to be accessible, sharable, even snackable, and I hope you'll all check it out.

Now, there will be good news to celebrate. For example, around the world we've nearly closed the gender gap in primary education. But there's also bad news, including the persistent gap between boys and girls in secondary education.

When it comes to technology, the data reveals a massive digital divide. An estimated 200 million fewer women than men are online in developing countries. And you know better than most how Internet access can help unleash economic growth, lift people out of poverty.

So this is a problem but it's also an opportunity to build new markets, to improve education, to spur new growth. Technology has the potential to empower women and girls like nothing ever before, and it is helping inspire and mobilize grassroots action in places we'd never expect.

I've seen that firsthand. I've seen how innovations starting right here are helping to lift people out of poverty, giving them more control over their own lives, helping them hold their governments accountable.

I'll never forget one woman I met at a tech camp that we set up at the State Department in Lithuania to train pro-democracy activists from Russia and other former Soviet countries, help them stay one step ahead of the censors and secret police. It was part of a broader effort that included investing in new apps and devices to protect dissidents, like a panic button that a protestor could press on a phone that would signal to friends that she was being arrested, while simultaneously erasing all of her personal contacts.

For the tech camps we brought along experts from Twitter, Facebook, Microsoft, to explain how activists could protect their privacy and anonymity online, and thwart restrictive government firewalls.

I asked one women from Belarus if she was scared that coming to this tech camp would get her in trouble back home. She said, "No. My government can go to hell," she said. "I'm here to learn how I can promote democracy."

My goal was to make the State Department a hub of innovation, leading the way with what we call 21st century statecraft, harnessing new technologies, public-private partnerships, diaspora networks, tapping expertise right here in Silicon Valley to help build programs that would address the challenges, from the drug war in Northern Mexico to the epidemic of rape in Eastern Congo to persecution in the Middle East, and a partnership we called Civil Society 2.0 helped deliver technology training to more than 1,000 civil society organizations from 80 countries.

And I was very pleased that we were ranked in the State Department as having the most innovation friendly culture. Now the Federal Government has a long way to go, so you might think that's damning when saying praise, but we were pleased that the work we were doing was being recognized that we could effectively partner with Silicon Valley and the broader tech community.

We had a great public-private partnership called M Women, which brought together leading telecom companies from around the world to narrow the digital divide. And there was this wonderful woman from India at the launch event. She represented the Self-Employed Women's Association, SEWA, an economic cooperative that has transformed the lives of millions of poor women through microloans and other support.

Here's the story she told me. She said for most of her life she had never seen a cell phone. She made a meager living by picking flowers and then bringing them to the local market, where she would go from trader to trader hoping to find a buyer. Sometimes her entire day was spent this way with nothing sold. Then she joined SEWA and through SEWA she got a loan for $48 to buy her first mobile phone. Suddenly she could actually call different markets, arrange to sell her flowers at a fair price in a fraction of the time. She used the money she saved to start a small business. She stared buying and selling grain from neighboring villages also using her cell phone. It was her dream that every woman would get a phone.

Now the bottom line from all the data and all the stories is this, we still have a long way to go but progress is possible, especially when we make a commitment of resources and political will. In fact, I think we are at a pivotal point that requires all of us to work together, roll up our sleeves, figure out what we're going to do, whether it's here in Silicon Valley or halfway around the world, to help shape the future we want, to close the digital divide, to unlock our full potential, crack every last glass ceiling.

So technology presents both peril and promise for all human beings, and it also presents some challenges for our economy. And this is another area where we should be clear-eyed about the gains and the gaps. American innovation, including the work many of you do, holds such enormous potential, whether it's clean energy or cloud computing or the Internet of Things, new advances will continue to revolutionize how we live, learn, and do business. And increasingly the divide between the old economy and the new is breaking down. The next wave of innovation could reach far beyond not just Silicon Valley but certainly beyond our nation's borders, creating new industries and remaking established ones.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And that's important because even the most successful tech startups rarely end up hiring large numbers of American workers. So there's enormous promise in the intersection of new technology, IT, but also nanotech, biotech, robotics, and traditional industries like energy, automobiles, healthcare, education and more. That's really the beating heart of the American economy. That's where most Americans work. So we should set our sights on increasing productivity, spurring growth and improving standards for all, not just a few at top.

And let's be honest, as we've learned the hard way, there can be a real human cost to some of these amazing innovations. We can't lose sight of that. Just as technology can boost productivity and create jobs, it has the potential to put many people out of their jobs by automating processes that used to require a full day's work, advances that are supposed to move us ahead can end up leaving a lot of people further behind.

And I know from my own travels and discussions how many Americans feel the ground shifting under their feet. The old jobs and careers are either gone or unrecognizable, and the old rules just don't seem to apply. And, frankly, the new rules are just not that clear. And the result is anxiety and dislocation.

Just think about how much our families have changed with caregivers becoming breadwinners. Well, our jobs have changed, too, and wages no longer rise with productivity, while CEO pay keeps going up. Young people expect to change jobs much more frequently, certainly, than their parents. So if we want to find our balance again, we have to figure out how to make this new economy work for everyone. That's why we have to ask how we organize ourselves so that technological change helps create more jobs not just disrupts and displaces them.

And how we try to have rising wages. We have to redouble our efforts to provide the education and skills, not just for our kids, but for adults, too, so they have the tools they need to change jobs, or start businesses. And we had to think hard about how to have the flexibility and support that American families need so that parents can be both great workers and great parents. And that brings me back to Moore's Law and the march of progress, because we can't do this without working together. We can't do it without really empathizing and understanding what our neighbors are going through. But, I think we can help more families find a way forward, find their footing in the middle class, find a way to see rising wages and rising hope.

I think it's within our grasp, but I know it's not inevitable. Our economic success is not a birthright. It can't be inherited. It has to be earned by each generation, just like it was earned by those who came before us. My grandfather was a factory worker in the lace mills in Scranton, Pennsylvania, proudly worked there from the age of 11 until he retired at 65. My father made it to college on a football scholarship, started a small business, my mother overcame a childhood of abandonment to help build a middle class life for me and my brothers and I knew I was a beneficiary not only of their love and hard work, but their aspirations for us and a larger community that believed as they did in America's promise.

I never doubted how fortunate I was to live in America at a time of such positive change from the post-war economic boom to the Civil Rights Movement, to the Women's Moment. And I hope for all of our children the same sense of possibility that I had. Now it can be easy to get discouraged sometimes if you look only at the headlines, but if you look at the trend lines you can see there is a movement stirring across our nation. It is about putting families first. It is about creating a 21st Century economy for 21st Century families.

You can see it in parents across California who demanded paid sick leave so they wouldn't have to choose between their jobs and their kids. You could see it in the security guards right here in Silicon Valley who are organizing for more hours not fewer. You can see it in the hourly workers in San Francisco who fought to make shift schedules more predictable and family life more stable. You can see it in the businesses and community leaders coming together to invest in early childhood education in Oakland. And you can see it in the moms demanding equal pay for equal work and the dads demanding access to quality affordable childcare.

So many people are just asking for that same chance, a chance at a living wage at their dreams and there are many reasons to think that we will reinvent ourselves, we will figure out how we're going to do this. We'll be part of the solution. That's really what I think lead on means. Yes, lead on for yourselves. All of us have to come to grips with rising and falling, as I heard Renee Brown say at the very end. We fall together, we rise together.

And as women let's do more to help all women lead on and succeed. My friend Madeline Albright famously said there is a special spot in hell for women who don't help other women. (Applause.) So what you do does not have to be big and dramatic. You don't have to run for office. (Cheers, applause.) Although if you do more power to you. (Cheers, applause.) But, seriously, a helping hand or a kind word can make a big difference. It's one of those click moments where you realize that helping somebody else not only feels good, but ends up helping you.

The more we stand with each other the more obstacles we can overcome, the more we will be able to shape our own destiny. That's true not just for women, it's true for everyone. Indeed, it's true for our entire country. So you came here today under the banner of lead on, wanting to listen and learn and meet and talk and network, because there may be nuggets you can pick up and use for your own professional or personal betterment. But, there may also be ways you can think about, you know, I hadn't thought about how that could help my friend, or my coworker, my neighbor.

I'm going to try to have a conversation about what I heard today, or about an issue that you really have been kind of stewing over, but now maybe go out and find some other people to lead on with you to try to resolve, to prove every single day that progress is possible in our own lives and believe me I know that's not easy, because we have no time to waste.

You know in our report, the progress report we're issuing with the Gates Foundation on the progress women around the world, including in the United States have made over the last 20 years. We boldly assert that there has never been a better time to be a woman in the history of the world. (Applause.) And, indeed, I believe that with all my heart. The changes that I've seen in my own life, the changes I've watched my daughter go through, and what I now think about the future for my granddaughter, I'm absolutely convinced of that. But I also believe, and maybe it's part of the American DNA, we have a special obligation to make it better for each other as well as ourselves and to set an example for people across the globe.

When my granddaughter Charlotte was born on September 26th, 2014, I have to confess I was just overwhelmed. I've had lots of friends who got to grandparenthood before me and who have far more grandchildren than I will ever catch up to. And I heard them and I listened to them, and I thought that's really nice. (Laughter.) And then all of a sudden here is this new life, this new hope, this new opportunity, this blessing given to us in my family. And, of course, her parents, her grandparents, her extended family, we will do whatever it takes to make sure that this baby has every opportunity in the world. But even as I say that I know that's not enough. She will become a citizen of our country and of the world, 20-25 years, god willing, and what kind of world is going to be there waiting for her? Is it a world of hope or fear? Is it a world of possibility or of shrunken, destroyed dreams?

I don’t know. I do know that it really matters for the life I hope she will lead that we do everything we can now to make sure every child is given the same opportunities we will do our best to provide for her. I believe talent is universal but opportunity is not. And leading on means in large measure how we expand that circle of opportunity so every girl and boy has a chance to be all she or he can become with their own efforts, their own works, but with the support and the love of the rest of us.

The time to start is now. I'm excited about what we can do together, and I believe that all of us can certainly show the way as we lead on to the kind of future we want.

Thank you all very, very much

(Applause.)

ANNOUNCER: Ladies and gentlemen, to lead a special conversation with Secretary Clinton please welcome to the stage technology commentator and entrepreneur Kara Swisher.

KARA SWISHER: I didn't know I was an entrepreneur.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: It's always a definition, right.

KARA SWISHER: Yes, exactly.

I have to make an announcement.

Excuse me for a second, Secretary Clinton.

The sessions afterwards are at 3:20, but I think we all want to listen to her, correct? (Applause.)

So hello.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Hello.

KARA SWISHER: How are you doing?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So I interviewed President Obama last week and I'm very eager to interview another president. (Cheers, applause.)

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: That's good.

KARA SWISHER: So I want to ask the big question, iPhone or Android?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: iPhone. (Cheers.) Okay, in full disclosure, and a Blackberry. And I think the president told you the same thing, because I think he really loves his.

KARA SWISHER: Well, you know, it is --

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: There are reasons why when you start out in Washington on a Blackberry you stay on it in many instances. But, it's also -- I don't know. I don't throw anything away. I'm like two steps short of a hoarder. So I have an iPad, a mini iPad, an iPhone and a Blackberry.

KARA SWISHER: You know, if you lived in, and I go to Washington a lot lately, my kids are living there, and you would think Blackberry was the biggest company in the world form all the people that -- because everybody uses it.

All right, second one, Apple Watch or Fitbit?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, you can tell I'm not doing Fitbit and I haven't gotten into the Apple Watch yet. I'm not in a wearable frame of mind yet. You know, I mean three people have given me a Fitbit or a Jawbone, and I look at it and I think do I really want something telling me I should do what I know I should do? I mean I have enough stress in my life avoiding doing what I'm told I should do, so I haven't jumped off the ledge yet.

KARA SWISHER: Okay. President of the United States, running for President of the United States or host of the Oscars next year, both jobs are open it seems?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes. Well, and both jobs are really painful from my own personal experience and observation. I don't think I could do the bird man imitation. That goes back to the Fitbit conversation. I just couldn't do that.

KARA SWISHER: What about the president thing?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: You know, there have been a lot more Oscar presentations than there have been presidents. So the pressure is probably somewhat less. It's a one-night gig. And for many it's just one night. And the other one it's like a many year commitment.

KARA SWISHER: Eight in your case, you hope, correct?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, yes. You've got to hope that. And I am, look, if you don't tell anybody, I am obviously talking to a lot of people, thinking through, because here's my view on this, Kara. I just think that we have so many big issues that we have to deal with that unless we really can come together and have a national conversation about those issues, we're not going to make the progress we made. And there are a lot of things that I would love to see our country do. I would like to bring people from right, left, red, blue, get them into a nice warm purple space where everybody is talking and where we're actually trying to solve problems. And that would be my objective if I decide to do this.

KARA SWISHER: Why wait announcing? There are all these women here in Silicon Valley, which is an anomaly. This is an anomaly, let me tell you. (Cheers, applause.)

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, all in good time is sort of my response because there's a lot to think about. I have to tell you. I don't know how many of you are list makers, I have a very long list. I'm going down it. I'm very committed to go down it, but I haven't checked off the last couple of things here.

KARA SWISHER: So I guess if I asked you Queens for Brooklyn for the announcement, you're not going to tell me. Okay.

If you were to run, what would be the central parts of the campaign for you? You mentioned a lot of things. The purple thing, I get that. But what would be the central thing that you would want to --

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, let me answer it this way by saying, whoever runs here's what I hope the central thing is, because we have to restore economic growth with rising wages for the vast majority of Americans, and we have to restore trust and cooperation within our political system so that we can act like the great country we are. (Cheers, applause.)

And those two things, it seems to me, are actually related, because there are some steps that business has to take. We heard Renee talking about what Intel is going to do. I talked about Google. And we have to have businesses take a hard look, how can they expand opportunity, be more inclusive, that's part of it.

But we also have to figure out how we can have a foundation in our economy again that makes people feel that their hard work and effort will be rewarded because productivity is actually up. People are working longer hours than many had to work in the past. But there's just no increase in their wages that demonstrates they're respected, appreciated.

KARA SWISHER: What could a supposed president do to fix that?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I think that --

KARA SWISHER: Actually, I'm going to call you the alleged president.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, this is where I'm supposed to say, stay-tuned. But what I would say is, this is why we need to figure out how to go after this problem. And some of it is a bottom up issue, like the minimum wage. Some of it is a fairness and equity issue, like equal pay for equal work, like paid leave so that people can actually stay in the workforce. Women are, not because they want to but because they have to, dropping out of the workforce in many instances, thereby diminishing their income. So there are certain steps that a government can and should take, and in the past you've seen a government sort of shore that up.

And then there are ways that we have to recast our thinking. You know, so much about the rise in productivity without the rise in wages has to do with decisions that businesses are making. And a lot of businesses say to me, but we are under tremendous pressure, quarterly pressure. We have to meet certain targets. And we just don't have the leeway. And my response is, well, then we need to create that leeway. How do we look at what's happening in corporate governance, in how the incentives work within the corporate world today, and figure if there isn't some way we can help the good guys so that they can actually do more for their employees.

I'm looking at a lot of different approaches.

KARA SWISHER: Can you actually create jobs, because you referenced it, and many Silicon Valley people reference that there are going to be fewer jobs, and that as things become automated --

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, let me give you two quick examples. One, look at the enormous numbers of jobs that technology created starting in the '90s, it was a huge explosion, not just in tech companies but across the board. And now we've got to figure out are we hitting a ceiling because with increased innovation, automation, we're not able to create more jobs, or is there more that we can do in order to promote job creation? But it's not just job creation; it has to be with a rising wage and opportunity ladder.

Energy is a huge opportunity. Energy efficiency jobs are woefully under-represented in the economy. Now, there are things that both utility companies and governments at local, state, federal level could do to encourage more jobs that would move us toward more renewable energy. We've done a bit of it, but we haven't done near enough of it. And so there is an area where it's sitting right there, and we're not doing everything we could. We don't have a level playing field. We still highly subsidize non-renewable, non-clean energy. We should have a much more open, competitive so that energy efficiency, solar, geothermal, wind, all of that is on a stronger foundation. And we will create more jobs.

(Applause.)

KARA SWISHER: Why do you think we need a woman president, I'm just curious?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Again, speaking hypothetically, well, you know --

KARA SWISHER: We can say President Warren, if you want.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I think whoever it is or should be, we need to make sure that all the talent in our country is represented.

KARA SWISHER: Do you think it would be a different president being a woman?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I can only speak both for myself and for my experience. But having been in the Senate, and having seen the difference that women in the Senate made -- the most famous example, and it's literally hard to believe right now, but in the '70s and '80s, women were not used as subjects in clinical trials by the National Institutes of Health. And, in fact, big trials on breast cancer did not include women patients. And it's so sad, right. And so along came somebody like Barbara Mikulski, and others who were determined to lead on, and they changed that.

That's a specific example, and there are many others, where the experience of being a woman, the ability to see what others might not see as either gender discrimination or marginalization, gives us a chance to speak up, to be heard, and to make changes. When I was first lady, I worked with a lot of the breast cancer advocates to continue on breast cancer because it was one of the most egregious examples. And we kept seeing how research for the cause and prevention of breast cancer kept being cut. And so I worked with a lot of these advocates, and we put a breast cancer research program into the Defense Department budget because it wouldn't be cut. Now, we had to keep saving it, because people found it and tried to cut it. But that's the kind of difference when you sit and talk.

And this is bipartisan, women on both sides of the aisle, they have these views, and we had some of the best times. We had dinners every month together. They were totally off the record. They were not political. We would say, well, what are you working on? How can we help? And so it was what you would hope your elected officials would do together. And I think there's a lot more of that. And women in public life do bring that perspective which we need.

KARA SWISHER: Let's get to Silicon Valley. You talked about Rosanna Arquette's statement at the Oscars, the wage inequalities. Those numbers you quoted for Google is every single company in Silicon Valley. It's essentially white dudes and a couple of ladies. What do you think about that? This is supposed to be our most fast-forward industry, the one where all the jobs are, but it's completely --

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I've thought a lot about it. And I think there are, I'll over-generalize, but three big reasons. One, this pipeline problem. When you had more women getting computer science degrees in the '80s by a factor of two-plus than you do now, that kind of lets people off the hook. Why aren't more girls and women going into this field?

What was different about being a high school or college student in the '80s than it is today and I think we need to unpack that. And we have to do more to create opportunities for girls to have access to computer science, programming, coding experiences, to kind of light those interests in them and then secondly I do think you have to recognize that it ends in technology, which has just exploded over the last 20 years. It's been a very almost wild west environment.

And I think a lot of women find that distasteful, unappealing to be in a situation sort of resembling a locker room in some ways where you just feel like you're -- it's hard to get, you know, your voice in. It's hard to be heard. It's like that classic tale where you say something in a meeting and nobody pays attention and then 20 minutes later a man says it and everybody thinks he's a genius. And I've had that experience a lot of times. And you just have to kind of gird up and you therefore need support systems like the Watermark, or like this conference, because it's not easy if you poke your head above the parapet if you're in technology, politics, and a lot of other areas. And the third thing is I think that companies should be held to account. I mean you need shareholders and executives and customers and others to say, hey, you can do better than 83 percent male.

KARA SWISHER: How do you do that? Right now there's a trial going on in the open today of a big Silicon Valley venture from Kleiner Perkins about gender discrimination. It's a very tough case, both sides not settling. How do you stop this systematic and the environmental qualities that create that locker room and how do you imagine that shifting, because everyone says, oh, we shouldn't have it and then there it is, or the women are not on the board. The women are not --

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Look, I think that it requires both men and women to speak up and speak out about this. And I think for men it's always fascinating when you talk to groups of men in tech or any other industry it's almost inevitable in my experience that some of them will tell me how great their daughters are and how well their daughters are doing and what their daughters hope to become. And I always say, well, don't you want your daughter to be able to go as far as she can go in whatever field she chooses. Oh of course, well you're a bank, you're a big corporation, you're this, you're that. You'd better pay attention to the kind of environment that educated young women are going into and maybe raise questions about it.

So men have to be more sensitive to, more interested in creating this environment. If you can't get them on the daughter side of the argument try to get them on the fact that we now are amassing evidence that corporations with women on boards actually do better. They have a higher ROI, they are consistently more successful. And so we have some both personal and some statistical data to back it up. But, then I think for women that's why I ended by talking about how we have to support each other more. And this is a constant challenge and we need to be willing to stand up for other women, to raise questions about how other women are being treated.

I remember all those years ago when I was in this law firm around 3:00 every secretary, every administrative assistant, every woman paralegal would be on the phone trying to make sure their kid got home safely, because the kids were coming home, they were what we called them latchkey kids. And they wanted to make sure their kids were safe. And they were whispering in the phone, because you're not supposed to make personal phone calls at business. And I finally I went to the partners and said, this is absurd. You should have a window of opportunity. These women work so hard, they're great members of our team. So you need to pick up on what's happening and not just among your peers, but women who may not have the power and position you do and then finally develop a thick skin.

I mean, you know, my favorite predecessor Eleanor Roosevelt said that women in the public arena have to grow skin as thick as the hide of a rhinoceros. And you have to be prepared, you know, try to think ahead of the smart thing you'll say if somebody makes an offensive comment to you, instead of what we all do, which is you sit there shocked and then in bed at night you think, oh, I wish I had said this. So have a stock of those that you kind of carry around with you and throw out and kind of say, oh, take that.

KARA SWISHER: You're pretty good at that, actually.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I have had a lot of practice. I mean really.

KARA SWISHER: Would you put this idea of childcare at the center of an administration, a real center and not a sort of side way? Did you do enough in the last campaign to bring it to the center? Many say you didn't.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: You know, I've heard that and I certainly am trying to learn from what I did right and what I didn't in thinking through doing this again. I think that the family issue, sort of putting families first, creating more supportive work environments so that if you do that what people find, I mean, is that women who get treated well as such loyal employees, they will stay with the company, they will work double time, they will do everything they can to make the enterprise that supported them successful. So this is not a nice thing to do, this is a win-win. So I think the childcare, these families issues are now bubbling to the top of the list on people's minds.

KARA SWISHER: Okay. So let's talk a little bit about some of the issue in the tech sector. We talked back stage. Net neutrality, there's a vote on it Thursday. The President has been rather aggressive about making it a utility. Do you think it should be a utility?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Here's what I think. I think that it's for the FCC to do what they want to do to try to --

KARA SWISHER: Regulate it like a phone.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Create net neutrality as the norm they have to have a hook to hang it on and so they're hanging it on Title 2 of the --

KARA SWISHER: Do you like that hook?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, it's the only hook they've got. I don't know --

KARA SWISHER: What hook would you like, because your husband's administration and the bush administration before were mostly hands off in that regard?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well you see how things developed. I mean it wasn't really a threat until relatively recently. I think I gave my first statement about net neutrality about eight or nine years ago and we know how important it is, because of concentration in the industry and the like. But, I think if there were another hook it would come out of a modern 21st Century telecom technology act and we don't have that and we're not likely to get it.

KARA SWISHER: Should this vote happen that way?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes, absolutely.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KARA SWISHER: Would you vote for that?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes, I would. Yes, I would.

KARA SWISHER: Yes to that act, but what about the one the FCC is about to --

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I would vote for net neutrality, because as I understand it it's Title 2 with a lot of changes within it in order to avoid the worst of the utility regulations. So it's a foot in the door. It's a values statement. I think the president is right to be up front and out front on that. But, it's not the end of the discussion. I mean we need to do more about how the spectrum is allocated. We need to do more about how we incentivize more competition in broadband. We need to figure out how to treat connectivity as an infrastructure development. There's a lot of other aspects. So it's not just net neutrality standing alone, end of debate, and that should be part of a really smart legislative endeavor, but I don't think people believe that can happen in the short term.

KARA SWISHER: Okay. What about encryption? Right now Apple and Google are fighting the government. Do you have a side in this which I mean the President was sort of -- I was for it until I was against it kind of thing? Where you feel on encryption? Do you feel these companies should be able to encrypt these phones?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I think that you have a classic hard choice. I wrote a book called Hard Choices and it's not a dodge or a feint, because I think that what we're missing is people are kind of in their corners arguing about liberty versus security instead of saying, look, we all want to have privacy for the end user. That's what the companies are responding to. They're trying to be able to tell their customers we're going to protect your data. But, we also don't want to find ourselves in a position where it's a legitimate security threat we're facing and we can't figure out how to address it, because we have no way in to whatever is holding the information.

And we also are not operating in a vacuum. We know that other countries are taking their own steps to monitor the Internet, control the Internet, which we're not. But, what we've got to figure out is how you get the right balance. So encryption is a part of protecting people's legitimate right to privacy.

KARA SWISHER: How would you address Google and Apple if you were the President?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I've talked to some of the leaders in technology, some of the executives of these companies, and I think that's the way to start, a real conversation, where you say, look, here's our problem. If you were sitting in my seat, if all of a sudden some president said, okay, Mr. or Ms. X, we want you to be the head of the counter-terrorism or the new cyber warfare something that takes advantage of your expertise. So you're sitting in these meetings that the president and I and others have sat in and we can see the sequencing where we know people are in contact and where we have both human intelligence and some technology enabled intelligence and we know there is something going to happen and we're trying to figure out how to get through the door that has been locked.

So I think the conversation, rather than you don't understand privacy, and you don't understand security ought to be, okay, let's figure out how we're going to do this. So I don't have answer. I would be the first to say I don't have the answer. I think there are really strong, legitimate arguments on both sides. And what I would like to see is more of the kind of brainstorming that I've had the good fortune to do.

KARA SWISHER: Another issue of contention was the NSA. Would you throttle back the NSA in the ways that President Obama had promised and then hasn't come to pass?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I think the -- I mean look I think the NSA needs to be more transparent about what it is doing, sharing with the American people, which it wasn't. And I think a lot of the reaction about the NSA was people felt betrayed. They felt like, wait, you didn't tell us you were doing this and all of a sudden now we're reading about it on the front page and we're getting hammered by our customers and by other countries that I would say very hypocritically are going after our companies, because I know for a fact that there's not a country out there that doesn't do anything they can do to get an advantage. And they do things we would never do, like industrial espionage, like stealing intellectual property and so there's a lot that's going on in this space. And so when you say, well, would you throttle -- I mean the NSA has to act lawfully and we as a country have to decide what the rules are. And then we have to make it absolutely clear we're going to hold them accountable and what we had, because of post-9-11 legislation was a lot more flexibility than I think people really understood and was not explained to them and I voted against the FISA Amendment in 2008, because I didn't think that they went far enough to kind of hold us accountable in the Congress for figuring out what was going on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KARA SWISHER: By flexibility you mean too much spying power, really?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes, but how much is too much? And how much is not enough? I mean, that's the hard part. I think if Americans felt like, number one, you're not going after my personal information, the content of my personal information, but I do want you to get the bad guys, because I don't want them to use social media, use communications devices invented right here to plot against us, so let's draw the line. And I think it's hard if everybody is in their corner. So I resist saying it has to be this or that. I want us to come to a better balance.

KARA SWISHER: Do you think Edward Snowden was a traitor?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I can never condone what he did. And I think he stole millions of documents, and the great irony is the vast majority of those documents had nothing to do with American civil liberty, privacy or anything affecting us here at home. They were about information we had vis-à-vis China, Russia, Iran, others. And then he fled to China, then he ends up in Russia. So the president had given a speech before Snowden's disclosures laying out some of these issues that we needed to address. So people were beginning to take a deep breath after a decade of 9-11 reaction, and the president was sort of leading that. And then along comes Snowden and puts forth information into the public domain that people are entitled to know, but I think it's fair to say a lot of it was nothing to do with the subject we're talking about, but very damaging to our national security vis-à-vis countries that do their very best to gather information about us.

KARA SWISHER: Okay, two more things, a couple more topics. ISIS is serving videos, they're using social media, creating terror there. Has the administration done enough to tackle the problem, and what would you do more to deal with them?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, again, how much time do we have? I think not enough.

KARA SWISHER: As much as you want.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes. Look, okay, then let me start with this. ISIS is the manifestation of a movement that is incredibly fueled by an obsession to control territory, to reestablish as they say a caliphate that would be governed by people with a very retrograde view of everything about women, everything I care about, everything about due process, or rights, or anything. We know that.

So why did they get a foothold? First of all, they're the successor to what was called Al-Qaeda in Iraq. Al-Qaeda in Iraq was an Al-Qaeda affiliate that was based in the Sunni regions within Iraq and was fighting the Shiite forces in Iraq during the American involvement in Iraq. They were so brutal at that time that it provided the opportunity for a lot of the Sunni tribal sheiks and community leaders to band against them, to come together to try to drive them out of Anbar province and out of the Sunni dominated regions. And they were successful in doing so because they finally decided that the enemy of my enemy is my friend didn't work, because these people were so brutal, so beyond the pale.

So they effectively squashed them, and then the United States turned over Iraq to the elected leadership of then Prime Minister Malaki. And he proceeded to alienate all of the Sunni leaders and citizenry, purge the army of the Sunni officers, generally behaved in a sectarian, exclusive, oppressive way. And so these shoots that had been suppressed began to pop through the surface.

Meanwhile, next door in Syria, you have all kinds of extremist groups taking advantage of the vacuum there, and one of them morphed into ISIS and was able to recruit former officers in the Saddam Hussein army as well as foreign fighters, as well as very hardened combat experienced jihadists, and were able to gather up a lot of resources by breaking into banks and stealing everything in them, by stealing oil and selling it on the black market, et cetera, and they did something that up until now no other extremist group has done as effectively and that is use social media.

All of a sudden it wasn't just like, oh, my gosh, those people are killing each other over here again. It was, oh my gosh, they are threatening us. They are recruiting kids from the United States, Canada, Europe, elsewhere. They are threatening to expand their territorial grasp. They are really a metastasizing danger. So therefore we have to work with our partners in the region to try to diminish and eventually eradicate the threat because it does affect us.

KARA SWISHER: But how? Do you think enough is being done?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Well, I think that it's a very hard challenge because you can't very well put American or Western troops in to fight this organism. You have to use not only Air Force, but also army soldiers from the region, and particularly from Iraq. And so what Americans are doing now is helping to retrain the Iraqi army after it was really decimated by Malaki, trying to get leadership back in within the Sunni regions, trying to integrate them so the Sunnis feel they have a stake in the future, supporting the Kurds because the Kurdish Peshmerga are right now certainly the best fighting force. It's like three, four, five dimensional chess.

So yes, I think a lot of the right moves are being made, but this is a really complicated and long-term problem, because remember we've got Al-Qaeda in Yemen. We've got Boko Haram in North Africa. We've got terrorist groups from the Sinai through Libya and south into Mali. This is a long-term struggle.

KARA SWISHER: Are you sure you want to be president then?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes. Well, every time has its own problems. So these happen to be some of ours.

KARA SWISHER: That's true. So two more very quick questions. If you could wave a wand and change anything about this country what would it be, one thing?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: That's so hard.

KARA SWISHER: And not another season of Downton Abbey or something like that. (Laughter.)

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: I hope that happens without me waving a magic wand. You know, if we could get back to working together cooperatively again. That we could get out of our mind sets, our partisan bunkers. We've come so far. We still have lots to do on ending sexism and racism and homophobia and all kinds of really bad issues that we've had to confront. And we have work still to do, but we're making a lot of progress.

But nobody wants to associate with anybody who doesn't agree with them politically. You can't have a conversation. People won't listen to each other. They listen to different media. And those different media tell different stories about the very same thing that you're watching unfold in front of your eyes. You cannot run a great country like that. And this is the greatest country. And we need to start acting like it and working like it again. (Applause.)

KARA SWISHER: Do you think you've become less polarizing?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Yes, obviously I think I have. I mean, I think that -- I was a little bit -- when I was First Lady of Arkansas, I worked on a lot of really controversial issues in education and health, and I worked with people across the aisle, worked with people of different philosophies within the Democratic Party in those days there were lots of very conservative Democrats.

And then I go to Washington and all of a sudden it's considered just an incredible shock that somebody like me, who has been an advocate and involved in so many movements for so long would actually have an opinion about something like healthcare for everybody or whatever it might be. So I think there was some back and forth there that I had to understand better and I certainly tried to do that when I ran for the senate. That was something that I stressed. And when I worked in the Senate I was very much somebody who would work across the aisle, look for opportunities to do that, because I don't think I have all the right ideas. I don't think my party has all the right ideas.

I think there are good ideas in lots of places. But, if you don't talk to each other you don't listen to each other, and in Washington you don't spend time with each other, because you fly in, you vote, vote, vote, and then you fly out to go raise money.

And I'll just end with this, because I know we're running out of time, I was so proud of my friend, Patty Murray, the Senator from Washington, who when the government was shut down a year or so ago she was the chair of the budget committee. And so they shut the government down and then they reopen it, but they basically say we have to pass a budget. And they turned to Patty and they say, okay, well, you're the chair of the Budget Committee, go work out a budget. So Patty worked with Paul Ryan, the former Vice Presidential Nominee for Mitt Romney, Congressman from Wisconsin, and they actually talked to each other.

They didn't show up at a big conference table with phalanxes of true believers on each side of them, with notebooks filled with argumentation. They had breakfast together. They had lunch together. They'd sit and talk about what each of them wanted, knowing that they couldn't agree on giving each other everything, but how could they make enough decisions to reach a consensus. And they did. So it's possible and it requires relationship building. A lot of people that I have really serious disagreements with I found ways to work together and I got to know better. And that's kind of lost. So this is, as you can tell, one of my pet peeves here.

KARA SWISHER: So my last question, I asked this of the President, last question, if you could have a hash tag for the next few years, and you can't do grandmother knows best, you've used that one.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: That's such a good one.

KARA SWISHER: But, you could do Hillary 2016 if you want, but just offering a suggestion. I love hash tag I love selfies, whatever. What would it be, your hash tag?

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Lead on. (Laughter, applause.)

KARA SWISHER: All right. Thank you.

SEC. HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you all very much.

KARA SWISHER: Take a bow.

Clinton calls for 'growth and fairness economy,' vows Wall Street crackdown // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 13, 2015

In her most sweeping policy address to date, Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monday presented her vision for a “growth and fairness economy” built on rising incomes for middle-class workers and vowed an aggressive crackdown on Wall Street.

Even as she outlined progressive policies she hoped would motivate liberal Democratic primary voters, Clinton attacked three leading Republican candidates by name for economic agendas she said would benefit corporations and wealthy people at the expense of ordinary workers.

“Today, as the shadow of crisis recedes and longer term challenges come into focus, I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy,” Clinton said. “You can’t have one without the other.”

She added, “The defining economic challenge of our time is clear: We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so they can afford a middle-class life.. . .That will be my mission from the first day I’m president to the last.”

Clinton’s 45-minute speech Monday morning, delivered in a formal setting at the New School, a progressive college in Greenwich Village, is intended to form the basis of her campaign for the months to come.

With liberals openly concerned about her historic coziness with Wall Street — and with her insurgent primary rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), drawing thousands at his rallies by railing against big banks — Clinton struck a tough tone on the financial industry.

Clinton asserted that many institutions are “too complex and too risky” and promised to go further than President Obama has both in regulating the industry and in prosecuting its bad players. As president, she said, she would appoint and empower regulators who understand that “too big to fail is still too big a problem.” And she promised to ensure that the financial markets “work for everyday investors, not just high-risk traders.”

“Too often it has seemed that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences or none at all, even when they’ve already pocketed the gains,” Clinton said. “This is wrong. And on my watch, it will change.. . .We will prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud.”

But Clinton may not have presented an aggressive enough Wall Street agenda to satisfy some liberals. As she concluded her speech, one man stood in the auditorium and shouted repeatedly, “Senator Clinton, will you restore Glass-Steagall?,” a reference to a 1990s-era law that restricted banking activities. Clinton gave no answer as Secret Service agents encircled the man and others in the crowd applauded loudly to drown him out.

Clinton also tackled the so-called sharing economy, epitomized by companies like Uber and Aibnb. She said such firms were “polarizing our economy” by displacing or down-grading blue-collar jobs that once provided solid incomes.

“This on-demand or so-called ‘gig’ economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it’s also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future,” she said.

Later this week, perhaps to drive a contrast with Clinton, former Florida governor Jeb Bush plans to order an Uber ride on his phone during a visit to Silicon Valley.

In her remarks, Clinton tried to draw a contrast more with Republicans than with other Democrats. She argued that more than three decades of Republican “trickle-down” policies of cutting taxes and loosening corporate regulations have resulted in rising debt and have not helped workers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Twice now in the past 20 years, a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess,” she said.

Clinton singled out Bush for having said last week that people should “work longer hours” to boost the economy. He has clarified that he was referring to part-time workers who want to work longer hours, but Clinton seized on the remark nonetheless.

“He must not have met very many American workers,” Clinton said. “Let him tell that to the nurse that stands on her feet all day or the teacher that is in that classroom or the trucker that drives all night. . . They don’t need a lecture. They need a raise.”

Bush spokesperson Allie Bradenburger responded by saying Clinton is offering “antiquated proposals” that “protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity.”

Clinton attacked Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), another leading GOP candidate, for his tax plan. She said that his proposal would cut taxes for a household making $3 million a year by almost $240,000, which she noted was exponentially more than the annual earnings of a typical family.

“That’s a sure budget-busting give-a-way to the super wealthy,” Clinton said.

She also went after Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R), who will formally launch his campaign Monday afternoon.

“Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on worker’s rights,” Clinton said. Promising to defend collective bargaining, she added, “I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks.”

Clinton’s speech was heavy on thematic vision, but light on specifics. She said she would roll out more detailed policy prescriptions over the course of the summer on issues such as college affordability.

The campaign of one Democratic challenger, Martin O’Malley, tried to contrast Clinton’s remarks with the detailed economic plan the former Maryland governor already has laid out.

In a statement issued following Clinton’s speech, O’Malley spokeswoman Lis Smith said: “Rebuilding the American Dream will take more than vague promises. That’s why Governor O’Malley has set bold, progressive, and specific goals to make our economy work for more Americans.”

Much of Clinton’s agenda includes priorities that have shaped Obama’s second term priorities and issues Democratic congressional candidates highlighted in the 2014 midterm campaigns. This includes her focus on pay equity for women, paid maternal leave and sick days and expanding access to childcare.

“We should make it easier for Americans to be both good workers and good parents and caregivers,” Clinton said. She added, “I am well aware that for far too long these challenges have been dismissed by some as women’s issues. Well, those days are over.”

But Clinton previewed some new ideas, too, such as a corporate profit sharing plan she said she would expound upon during a visit to New Hampshire on Thursday.

"Hard working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they help produce," she said. "So I will propose ways to encourage companies to share profits with their employees. That's good for workers and good for businesses."

Clinton's economic platform DOA in today's Congress // WaPo // Kelsey Snell – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Monday outlined a wide-ranging list of economic proposals that focus on creating more opportunities for low-and-middle income earners while raising their wages, a populist message that could also appeal to more moderate voters during the general election.

Many of the ideas laid out by the front-runner to be the Democrat's presidential nominee in 2016 are variations on policy goals that have been put forward in the past by progressive Democrats, such as Sens. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), while others are similar to proposals pitched by President Obama. Others looked to expand on laws enacted during Obama's time in office.

If conventional wisdom holds and Republicans continue to control Congress after the 2016 elections — or at least the House — than many of the ideas discussed by Clinton will be dead on arrival.

Sign up for The Daily 202, The Washington Post's new political tipsheet

While Clinton didn't offer too many specifics, what follows is a look at how some of the ideas she discussed Monday have fared in Congress in recent years and whether they would have much of a chance under a President Clinton.

Minimum wage increase and worker protections. Clinton pitched a long list of policies aimed at middle-class workers, including a minimum wage hike, paid family leave and preventing employers from classifying employees as contractors to avoid paying benefits and overtime.

"We do have to raise the minimum wage, and implement President Obama's new rules on overtime, and then we have to go further," Clinton said.

Clinton could build on Obama's executive orders to expand leave time and increase wages for federal workers and empower the Labor Department to crack down on employee misclassification, but she would need Congress to approve a broader wage hike.

That would not be easy to do.

Republicans fought off legislation last year that would have gradually increased the federal minimum wage from $7.25 to $10.10 per hour over the course of more than two years.

Democrats had a majority in the Senate at the time and still failed to get the 60 votes necessary to overcome a Republican filibuster of the bill. Chances of rallying support with Republicans in both the House and Senate are slim, but Jared Bernstein of the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities said a wage increase could gain support if the economy continues to improve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Both Bush presidents passed minimum wage increases,” said Bernstein, a former economic adviser to Vice President Joe Biden. “There would be a fight over how much it would be increased and what conservatives would get in return but it is not impossible.”

Student loan refinancing. Clinton embraced an idea pushed by progressives like Warren and Sanders that would allow people with student loan debt to refinance their loans at current market rates. The plan has been popular with young voters who have amassed tens of thousands of dollars in debt to finance the rising cost of a college education.

While the proposal sounds good on the campaign trail, many Republicans say that student loan debt needs to be addressed as a part of complete higher education overhaul bill, making the proposal’s path through Congress more difficult. Republicans earlier this year blocked a Warren-sponsored budget amendment that would set lower rates for all borrowers, including a slightly higher rate for graduate students.

“The nature of these changes is they do not help people get into college, complete more quickly and get jobs,” said Doug Holtz-Eakin, president of the conservative American Action Forum and former economic adviser for John McCain during his 2008 presidential bid. Lowering interest rates for student loan debt “is a windfall for people who already have jobs.”

Increasing taxes on investment earnings and the wealthy. If Clinton’s talk of making the wealthy pay more in taxes by, for example, ending breaks enjoyed by hedge-fund managers sounds familiar it’s because it’s an Obama talking point straight out of the 2012 election.

But many of the tax ideas she ticked off Monday have been rejected by Republicans in Congress.

Clinton backed the Buffett rule, named for billionaire investor Warren Buffett who famously lamented paying a lower tax rate than his secretary, that would impose a minimum tax rate of 30 percent on earnings over $1 million. The idea never went anywhere in Congress.

She also proposed closing the so-called carried interest loophole, which allows investment managers to classify some, if not most, of their income as capital gains interest so they can pay lower taxes on those earnings. Clinton paired that proposal with a pitch to make it harder for wealthy financial advisers to avoid taxes.

Most Democrats love the proposals but they have virtually no chance of getting any Republican support. Obama and Senate Democrats increased the capital gains rate from 15 percent to 20 percent as part of the “fiscal cliff” deal reached in the final hours of 2012. Republicans grudgingly gave in then but have vowed to fight back against any attempt to increase this rate in the future.

Strengthening Dodd-Frank and cracking down on Wall Street. Clinton may have spent years representing Wall Street banks and traders as a senator from New York, but presidential candidate Clinton embraced putting more rules on the financial sector saying there is a need to “go beyond” the 2010 Dodd-Frank Wall Street reform law.

“Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky,” she said. “Serious risks are emerging from institutions in the so-called shadow banking system, including hedge funds, high-frequency traders, non- bank finance companies.”

Some Republican agree with liberal critics of Wall Street that “too big to fail” banks remain, but Republicans are unlikely to agree to new regulations after spending years arguing that Dodd-Frank is hurting lending and the broader economy.

Clinton appeared to have this criticism in mind when she made clear her intent is not to target the more traditional banking industry that focuses on such things as mortgages and business loans.

“We can do that, and still ease burdens on community banks to encourage responsible loans to local people and businesses they know and trust,” she said.

Clinton also hit on an issue that has led both Democrats and Republicans to criticize Obama’s Justice Department: The lack of criminal convictions stemming from the 2008 financial crisis.

“While institutions have paid large fines and in some cases admitted guilt, too often it has seemed that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences or none at all, even when they have already pocketed the gains,” she said. “This is wrong, and on my watch it will change.”

Immigration reform. The one issue that has a good chance in a Clinton presidency is also the one that failed most dramatically during Obama’s presidency: immigration reform.

The Senate overwhelmingly passed bipartisan immigration legislation in 2013 after months of negotiations led by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Robert Menendez (D-N.J.). The bill had the support of the business community, the Obama administration and 68 Senators. What it didn’t have was the backing of House conservatives.

Support has shifted in recent months and there is wide recognition among many in the House that immigration reform is necessary if not inevitable, said Holtz-Eakin. He said there is bipartisan support for rethinking the immigration system but there is too much bad blood between this Congress and Obama over this issue.

“The last attempt came on the heels of a long period of tension between the White House and Congress and they did not trust him,” Holtz-Eakin said. “New Congress, new president, you try again.”

Clinton, however, didn’t offer many specifics on Monday and the details of any immigration plan are what will be most contentious.

Tax and Budget: Hillary wants to reform the capital gains rate, and Democrats want details on federal contracts for inverted companies // WaPo // Kelsey Snell – July 13, 2015

HILLARY TO PITCH CAP GAINS REVAMP. Hillary Rodham Clinton is expected to outline her economic agenda Monday at 10 a.m., and early documents obtained by Reuters show part of that plan is rethinking the capital gains rate. Reuters cites a memo that reads:

“In the coming weeks, she will outline specific policies—for example, by reforming capital gains taxation—that will seek to counter the effect of this short-term focus.”

The idea of reforming taxes on income from investments is not new for Democrats. President Obama and Senate Democrats increased the rate from 15 to 20 percent as part of the “fiscal cliff” deal reached in the final hours of 2012. Republicans grudgingly gave in on the tax rate but have vowed to fight back against any attempt to increase the rate in the future.

Hillary Clinton's economic ideas would be big for Latinos. That's not a coincidence. // WaPo // Janell Ross – July 13, 2015

On Monday morning, Hillary Clinton laid out how she would narrow economic inequality and deal with the economic struggles of ordinary Americans. And later Monday, she'll head to the National Council of La Raza convention in Kansas City and likely repeat many of the same themes.

And maybe that's a coincidence of scheduling, but it's no coincidence that a lot of Clinton's proposals would be particularly beneficial to workers of color -- especially Latinos.

Here's the crux of what Clinton is talking about Monday:

As part of her workforce focus, Clinton will decry that women's participation in the workforce has stalled after decades of growth and that many working parents, especially single mothers, have passed up job opportunities because of family obligations. She will preview policies on child care, paid leave and paid sick days.

Clinton's second area of focus is reducing income inequality. She will assert that the current economy unfairly rewards some work, such as financial trading, more than other work. She will celebrate Obama's new rules on overtime but also urge raising the minimum wage and overhauling the tax code to make the wealthiest Americans pay what she considers their fair share. She will also back collective bargaining and reducing health-care costs.

Clinton will introduce these ideas in Monday's speech and then roll out more detailed prescriptions on issues such as college affordability, paid leave, wage growth and corporate accountability throughout the summer.

Clinton's speech at The New School in New York City and her policy proposals have been billed as ideas that will benefit the middle class. But during her speech, Clinton herself made some explicit references to workers of color. And Latino workers make up one of the fastest-growing segments of the workforce but are concentrated in lower-paying jobs with limited benefits. Hence, the kind of jobs that benefit most from things like paid sick leave, child care and maternity leave.

Here's what you need to know to understand why Clinton's policy ideas may have particular meaning to Latino voters.

Latinos made up about 16.6 percent of the American workforce in June. That's a figure that's expected to climb to nearly 20 percent within the next five years.

In 2011, when the U.S. Labor Department's statistical arm completed a deep dive on Latino workers in the recovery, the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that about 20 percent of Latino workers over the age of 16 were employed part-time. More recent figures from 2014 indicate that the portion working part-time has grown to nearly 23 percent of the Hispanic labor force. But the majority told the government's statistics team they were doing so for non-economic reasons such as the need to care for young children or older family members. So child-care issues and family responsibilities weigh heavily on Latino workers.

While the gap between white, black and Latino high school graduates going on to college has nearly disappeared, the portion of Latinos who graduate continues to lag further than every other group. In that 2011 look at Latino workers, the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that only one in six -- about 17 percent -- of Latinos 25 or older have completed a bachelor's degree.

This pattern is part of the reason that the majority of Latino workers -- about 58 percent -- are employed in the service industry, construction, maintenance, transportation and production industries and a far smaller portion -- about 32 percent-- work in professional or management jobs.

That also means that large numbers of Latino workers do not enjoy benefits that for many white-collar American workers are now part of the norm such as paid sick time, paid vacation days, partially paid maternity and/or paternity leave, extended time off to care for a sick relative or attend to their own serious health challenges and employer-provided health or life insurance.

The industries in which Latino workers are clustered also explains part of the yawning wage gaps between white workers and workers of color -- particularly Latinas. Latinas employed full-time earn about 56 cents to every dollar earned by white, non-Hispanic men employed full time, according to a National Women's Law Center analysis of 2013 Census data. That's compared to 64 cents on the dollar for full-time black female workers and 77 cents for white women working full time.

With that reality mind, the Clinton campaign knows that Clinton needs Latino workers who are also registered voters to turn out to vote in the upcoming Democratic primaries and the general election, should she make it that far. For Obama, some of these workers helped him win key swing states such as Nevada and Florida in 2008 and 2012.

Four ways Hillary Clinton distanced herself from Bernie Sanders on Monday // WaPo // Amber Phillips – July 13, 2015

From calling for raising middle-class wages to announcing a plan to share corporate profits with workers and go after Wall Street criminals, Hillary Clinton gave a remarkably populist/liberal speech Monday laying out her economic policies.

The 2016 Democratic frontrunner is highlighting her progressive bona fides on everything from social to economic issues as she contrasts herself with an increasingly conservative Republican field.

But she's also facing a stronger-than-expected challenge from the left in the form of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). The socialist is drawing large crowds across the country with his populist Robin Hood-style message of taking income from the rich and giving it to the poor and cracking down hard on Wall Street.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton says former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) doesn't understand the plight of American workers, telling supporters in an economic speech, "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise." (AP)

Sanders isn't a real threat yet to her path to the nomination, but Clinton most certainly had his adoring crowds in the back of her mind as she laid out her campaign's major economic policy points. Here's four ways she tried to differentiate herself from Sanders.

1. She's focusing more on policies to lift up women

Key quote: "For far too long these challenges have been dismissed by some as women's issues. Well, those days are

What she said: This time around, Clinton is making her potential history-making run for the White House a major theme of her candidacy. And she spent a good chunk of her time Monday at the progressive New School talking about how as president she'd implement specific federal policies to make it easier for women to work, such as fair pay laws and expanding access to child care and paid sick leave.

Why its different from Sanders: Sanders has advocated for similar policies, including 12-week paid maternity leave, but he doesn't spent as much time as Clinton talking about gender policy. And that makes some sense: Clinton has the potential to make history, and Sanders is doing a lot better among white liberal men, the polls show.

2. Wall Street deserves scrutiny, but it's not evil

Key quote: "I know firsthand the role that Wall Street can and should play in our economy helping main street grow and prosper."

What she said: Clinton certainly tried to appeal to the left-wing of her party by criticizing Wall Street as too focused on short-term, quarterly profits instead of America's long-term economic health. She promised to criminally prosecute Wall Street CEOS responsible for trading that led to the 2008 financial crisis, and she called for policies to rein in such trading, such as taxing risky high-frequency trading. But the former New York senator refused to vilify Wall Street as the over-arching reason Americans are hurting today.

Why it's different from Sanders: Sanders, by contrast, has made Wall Street one of his top enemies. "I think these people are so greedy, they're so out of touch with reality," he told CNBC's John Harwood in May. Sanders is promising a "revolution" to redistribute -- and he does use that word -- wealth from the top 1 percent to the masses. A key part of his plan is to break up big banks on Wall Street and raise taxes on the rich.

3. Progressiveness is good, but blind ideology is bad

Key quote: "Let's get back to making decisions that rely on evidence more than ideology."

What she said: Clinton ended her speech with what sounded almost like a plea to stop campaigning on purely partisan politics, which she blamed for creating Washington gridlock. Of course, she pitched herself as the candidate to do just that. "I want to have principled and pragmatic and progressive policies that really move us forward together," she said.

Why it's different from Sanders: While certainly criticizing Republicans here too, this part of her speech could almost be read as a direct shot at Sanders. His call to break up big banks and significantly raise the income tax rate is seen by establishment Democrats as just not politically viable. And on Sunday, Sanders seemed to make the case that Democrats shouldn't work with Republicans.

4. Everything she left out of the speech

Sanders-supporting liberals were closely watching Clinton on Monday to see if she'd stake out even more liberal positions on trade and minimum wage and welfare.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton probably left those folks wanting. She did not talk about expanding Social Security, she did not call for raising the national minimum wage to $15 an hour, and she did not explicitly disapprove of President Obama's trade deals with Pacific Rim nations and Europe.

So while she is pivoting to the left more than any other modern Democratic presidential candidate, what Sanders said Sunday on CBS's "Face The Nation" still holds true about the two candidates:

"There are very significant differences of opinion that we have."

Hillary Clinton signals how she'll attack Republicans on the economy // WaPo // Paul Waldman – July 13, 2015

One of the central challenges Hillary Clinton faces as a presidential candidate is how to deal with Barack Obama, a president with a mixed record and middling popularity ratings (not to mention one who used to be her boss). She isn't going to criticize him too directly, but she also needs to provide a full picture of how her presidency would be different from his.

In the economic speech she made today, Clinton showed how she's going to manage this on what will almost certainly be the most important issue of the 2016 campaign. And in (for her) a happy coincidence, the ground where she can draw those distinctions also provides some of the best opportunities to criticize the Republicans running for president.

The most thematically important section of Clinton's speech was this:

We're not going to find all the answers we need today in the playbooks of the past. We can't go back to the old policies that failed us before, nor can we just replay the successes. Today is not 1993. It's not 2009. So we need solutions for the big challenges we face now.

You can call this "distancing herself" from Obama, as many people surely will, but it's a bit more complicated than that. Here's the story as Clinton will tell it: Barack Obama came into office in the midst of the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression, and so he had to concentrate on pulling the country out of that disaster. Which he did — the economy has produced 12 million jobs since it hit bottom at the end of 2009. But now that the fire has been put out, it's time to address the challenges of a changing workplace and a transformed economy. In other words, it's not 2009.

In telling that story, Clinton has an easy answer whenever someone asks whether she's implicitly criticizing Obama for one thing or another: times are different now. But more fundamental is the contrast she can draw with Republicans. The biggest advantage Clinton may have in this debate is that as a Democrat, she believes that government can take an active role in shaping the economy for people's benefit. That means she can address a wide range of economic and workplace challenges and offer new ideas for how they might be confronted, whether it's paid sick leave or Wall Street regulation or early childhood education.

You can argue that these ideas are good or bad, but she'll have many more of them than Republicans will. Because Republicans think government's role should be far more limited, they have much less to offer on those specific questions. They'd rather not have a debate on things like sick leave, because their default answer — just get out of the way and let the market work its magic — sounds like they don't want to fix the problem.

In the speech, Clinton found ways to criticize all three top-tier Republican candidates. She seized on Jeb Bush's recent remark that "People need to work longer hours" as though he had made it just to do her a favor. "Well, he must not have met very many American workers," she said. "Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the teacher who is in that classroom, or the trucker who drives all night. Let him tell that to the fast-food workers marching in the streets for better pay. They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

I've argued that Jeb should be forgiven for this "gaffe," but there's no doubt it fits in perfectly with the argument Clinton and other Democrats are making: that they're the ones who want to raise wages and make the workplace more fair, while Republicans just want you to work harder for the benefit of your boss. And while she was at it, Clinton went after Marco Rubio's tax plan, saying it "would cut taxes for households making around $3 million a year by almost $240,000, which is way more than three times the earnings of a typical family. Well, that is a sure budget busting giveaway to the super wealthy, and that's the kind of bad economics you are likely to hear from any of the candidates on the other side." She also went after Scott Walker in an emphatically pro-union section of the speech:

Alongside tax reform, it's time to stand up to efforts across our country to undermine worker bargaining power, which has been proven again and again to drive up wages. Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on workers' rights, and practically all the Republican candidates hope to do the same as president. I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks. Evidence shows that the decline of unions may be responsible for a third of the increase of inequality among men, so if we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting union workers.

There was plenty more — it was almost a State of the Union address in its multiplicity of proposals, on everything from immigration reform to equal pay for women to corporate profit-sharing to preschool. Back in 2008, Clinton was sometimes criticized for delivering too much policy wonkery while Barack Obama was delivering inspiring rhetoric. That doesn't seem to have changed — however else her 2016 campaign will be different, Clinton will have no shortage of proposals related to the economy and the workplace.

Republicans will of course say that every last one is wrongheaded and dangerous. But if they don't have much to offer in response, that will probably be just fine with her.

Why Hillary Clinton made gender such a big deal in her major economic speech // WaPo // Danielle Paquette – July 13, 2015

Last year, as Hillary Clinton awaited the birth of her first granddaughter, Charlotte, a nurse at New York City's Lenox Hill Hospital thanked her for promoting paid family leave.

"She sees first-hand what it means for herself and her colleagues and the working parents she takes care of," Clinton said, recalling the encounter Monday in her first major economic speech this election cycle.

The memory illustrated what has thus far been a central message of Clinton's campaign: So-called "women's issues" are economic issues, and they intensify for millions of workers after those life-shaking trips to the maternity ward.

In her sprawling speech, which touched on Wall Street and Internet competition and the sharing economy, Clinton dedicated more than 1,000 words to burdens disproportionately carried by women -- a rarity in the context of policy addresses from front-running presidential candidates.

She called fair pay, flexible scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days "essential to our competitiveness and growth."

She told the stories of a single mother balancing full-time work and community college, highlighting the need for affordable childcare, and a grandmother who watches children for a living but can barely afford to fill her prescriptions, highlighting the weak financial rewards for providing it.

And she mentioned the disparity that makes all this even tougher for female workers nationwide: American women, on average, make 78 cents for every dollar earned by men. Women of color, Clinton added, make even less. The number, compared to white men's earnings, dwindles to 64 cents for black women, the National Women's Law Center reports, and 56 cents for Hispanic women.

"Another key ingredient of strong growth that often goes overlooked and undervalued: Breaking down barriers so more Americans can participate more fully in the workforce, especially women," she said. "We are in a global competition and we can't afford to leave talent on the sidelines."

Over the last four decades, the number of female breadwinners in the U.S. has more than tripled. This trend generated $3.5 trillion of economic growth, Clinton said -- but progress is stalling.

Full-time employment increased from 28.6 percent of all women in 1979 to 43.6 percent in 2007 before declining to 40.7 percent in 2012, according to the the Center for American Progress.

The reasons are complicated, and research suggests no one policy fix can vanquish social deterrents like, say, the well-documented unconscious biases that seep into hiring and promotion decisions.

An estimated 43 million American workers have no access to paid leave. They're mostly low-wage workers, already strained when recovering after the birth of a child, for example, or tending to a sick kid. Top earners, on the other hand, tend to receive the benefits through employers, according to a recent survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The problem compounds for single mothers who lack the benefits. Some economists argue closing the wage gap would lift nearly half out of poverty, according to a report from the Institute for Women's Policy Research.

"All this lost money adds up," Clinton said Monday, "and for some women, it's thousands of dollars every year."

Advocates say Clinton's policy prescriptions for gender equality could be a good start for leveling the professional playing field, so long as government mandates don't make matters worse for working women.

The results are mixed when it comes to paid leave, in particular. The three states that so far offer some form of it -- California, New Jersey and Rhode Island -- are already recording increased wages for mothers of young children.

But evidence from abroad warns about possible, unintended consequences of sweeping reforms. After Chile, for example, required large employers to cover daycare costs, women, whether or not they had children, started seeing lower starting pay.

Hillary Clinton's speech on the economy today sent an important message: That the ambitiousness of her agenda will be commensurate with the scale of the economic challenges the country faces.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The speech's big theme wasn't just that economic growth and the distribution of the fruits of that growth have come decoupled from one another. It was also that it is within our power to change this through a robust policy response — just as previous generations have "built" (her deliberate word choice) great economies and strong middle classes.

However, there are still plenty of specifics that need to be filled in — something her campaign has promised she will do in a series of speeches this summer.

So here are some of the questions that were left unanswered. From the speech:

"You know advances in technology and expanding global trade have created whole new areas of commercial activity and opened new markets for our exports, but too often they're also polarizing our economy — benefiting high-skilled workers but displacing or downgrading blue collar jobs and other mid-level jobs that used to provide solid incomes for millions of Americans….we do need to set a high bar for trade agreements. We should support them if they create jobs, raise wages, and advance our national security. And we should be prepared to walk away if they don't."

Where will Clinton come down on the Trans-Pacific Partnership? Today's rhetoric is consistent with her previous claim that any trade deal must "put us in a position to protect American workers, raise wages and create more good jobs at home." But this, of course, leaves room for her to decide either that the TPP does that or that it doesn't, and when we see the specifics of a deal, she'll have to take a stand. That won't be easy.

"Today's marketplace focuses too much on the short term – like second-to-second financial trading and quarterly earnings reports – and too little on long-term investments."

Will Clinton support a financial transactions tax to discourage "short-termism," as Bernie Sanders has called for? Or (and these things aren't mutually exclusive) will she support reforms to the tax code's treatment of executive compensation that the Center for American Progress has suggested in order to de-incentivize short-termism?

"We'll help families look forward to retirement by defending and enhancing Social Security and making it easier to save for the future."

Will Clinton come out for expanding Social Security, as Sanders and other progressive Democrats have? The choice of the word "enhancing" seemed deliberately vague.

"Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky. And the problems are not limited to the big banks that get all the headlines. Serious risks are emerging from institutions in the so-called "shadow banking" system — including hedge funds, high frequency traders, non-bank finance companies — so many new kinds of entities which receive little oversight at all…Over the course of this campaign, I will offer plans to rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and ensure that stock markets work for everyday investors, not just high frequency traders and those with the best — or fastest — connections."

Will Clinton call for re-instating Glass-Steagall, a key goal of the Elizabeth Warren wing of the party? One outside Clinton adviser says she won't. When Clinton says she'll "go beyond Dodd Frank," what will that look like?

Clinton, as expected, came out for incentivizing corporate "profit sharing," but said the specifics on how to accomplish that would have to wait until a speech in New Hampshire later this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Much of Clinton's speech was very programmatic. She came out for paid family and sick leave, universal early education, and more investments in job training, all under the umbrella of boosting mobility and opportunity. She backed comprehensive immigration reform, higher taxes on capital gains, and more in infrastructure spending.

But still more specifics will be forthcoming. The general ambition of her speech demands them. Indeed, it seemed designed, if anything, to raise expectations along these lines.

Hillary Clinton Economic Plan Emphasizes Growth and Increasing Wages // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, laying out her economic vision, said Monday that government must do more to rein in excessive risk-taking on Wall Street, push financial firms to focus on long-term growth over short-term gains and assure stock markets "work for everyday investors, not just high-frequency traders."

"The truth is the current rules for our economy do reward some work, like financial trading … much more than other work, like actually building and selling things," she said.

Her wide-ranging remarks included a series of hits on leading Republican presidential candidates. She said Sen. Marco Rubio's tax plan would reward the rich and argued that Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker made his name "stomping on workers' rights." Mrs. Clinton also charged former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush with wanting hardworking Americans to work even harder.

Overall, she said she is focused on growing the economy and increasing wages for all Americans, while Republican policies will aid only the wealthy.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, Allie Brandenburger, replied that Mrs. Clinton is backing antiquated policies and that Mr. Bush would push for 4% economic growth. "Hillary Clinton is proposing the same failed policies we have seen in the Obama economy, where the typical American household's income has declined and it's harder for businesses to hire and the middle class to achieve rising incomes," she said.

In her remarks, Mrs. Clinton gave few policy details, saying they will come later. She declined to respond to a protester who interrupted her remarks near the end of the speech demanding to know if she will reinstate Glass-Steagall, the Depression-era law separating plain-vanilla banking activities from riskier investment-banking bets that was repealed when her husband, Bill Clinton, was president.

Supporters of Mrs. Clinton in the audience at the New School in Manhattan drowned out the protester with applause and he was escorted from the auditorium.

Mrs. Clinton isn't expected to back such a sweeping regulatory policy, but she said that as president she would both defend and expand the Dodd-Frank financial-sector regulations put into place under President Barack Obama.

"Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky," she said. She said the problems aren't limited to big banks but include those in the "shadow banking system" such as hedge funds, high-frequency traders and nonbank finance companies.

She also said that too often companies guilty of wrongdoing are punished but the people responsible get away with limited or no consequences. "We will ensure that no firm is too complex to manage or oversee," she said. "And we will prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or criminal wrongdoing."

She promised a plan for the capital-gain tax that will "reward longer-term investments that create jobs, more than just quick trades." She didn't offer details.

As a whole, she said her economic plan would work to increase economic growth, as Republicans are pushing, and tackle inequality, as many in the Democratic Party are demanding.

To encourage growth, she said she would back an infrastructure bank to fund investments in airports, roads and bridges; an immigration overhaul to bring more people into the economic system; and a corporate-tax plan to close loopholes that she said reward companies for sending jobs and profits overseas. She also mentioned support for faster broadband networks, investments in clean energy and more money for medical research. She said she would help women participate in the workforce by backing child-care programs and paid leave.

To tackle inequality, she said she backs increasing the minimum wage, the Obama rules raising the threshold of pay that mandates overtime rates, reining in health-care costs, support for unions, reviving a "new markets" tax cut, and taxing so-called carried interest earned by investors as regular income. She also proposed new tax breaks to encourage corporate profit-sharing with employees, an idea she said she will expand on this Thursday.

With her heavy focus on growth, the speech offered an implicit critique of her Democratic rivals, but she ignored them in her remarks on Monday. Instead, she offered a string of attacks on Republican presidential contenders, and what she said was a GOP focus on aid for those at the top.

She pointed to Mr. Bush's comment last week that growing the economy will mean people have to "work longer hours," though he made clear he meant people who have part-time work must be able to find full-time employment.

"Now, you may have heard Gov. Bush say Americans just need to work longer hours. Well, he must not have met very many American workers," she said. Pointing to a variety of hardworking people, she said, "They do not need a lecture. They need a raise."

She also noted Mr. Walker's campaign to strip collective-bargaining rights from public-sector unions and said practically all Republican candidates want to do the same as president. She said unions have driven wages up and need to be supported. "I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks," she said.

Mr. Walker, who officially launched his campaign on Monday, defended his record. "We took power out of the hands of the big government special interests and put it firmly into the hands of the hardworking taxpayers," he said.

Mrs. Clinton said Mr. Rubio's plan would amount to a tax giveaway for the very rich. Mr. Rubio's spokesman, Alex Conant, replied: "Secretary Clinton wants to take us back to yesterday, but we cannot raise taxes like the 1990s or increase spending like the 2000s. Marco is proposing a 21st century tax plan that would benefit all Americans, especially middle-class families."

Hillary Clinton to Propose Tax Breaks for Firms Sharing Profits With Employees // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton will propose tax breaks for companies that create programs to share profits with their employees, part of an economic speech Monday where she will call for new action to raise middle-class wages.

Her overall theme is that raising incomes for all Americans is the nation's defining economic challenge.

"We need new ideas ... One that I believe in and will fight for is profit sharing," she plans to say Monday in her speech at the New School in New York City, according to a short excerpt provided by a campaign official. "Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce."

She plans to offer details on this idea at an event Thursday in New Hampshire.

The idea of profit-sharing is discussed at length in a report issued earlier this year by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank with deep ties to the Clinton campaign. The report said that profit sharing programs is aimed at making sure that corporate profits benefit a broad base of workers and not just top executives, on the basis of overall performance. Benefits, the report said, include higher pay, greater employee participation in decision-making, increased productivity and higher profits.

The report suggested tax incentives to encourage these arrangements, such as allowing companies to deduct certain incentive-based pay as a business cost.

Clinton to Bush: American workers need a raise // AP // Ken Thomas and Jill Colvin – July 13, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton accused former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush of lacking an understanding of the needs of American workers on Monday, using an agenda-setting economic speech to cast Republican prescriptions for the economy as relics of the past that would do little to boost wages for the middle-class.

Outlining the tenets of her economic agenda, Clinton seized upon the recent comments from Bush, who said last week in New Hampshire that "people need to work longer hours." She said that Bush "must not have met many American workers," and said he wouldn't hear that sentiment from teachers or nurses or truck drivers. "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise," she said.

The Democratic presidential front-runner outlined the themes of her economic agenda in a speech at The New School in New York City, where she called raising incomes for hard-working Americans the defining economic challenge facing the nation. The speech offered tough medicine for Wall Street traders just a few blocks away and included swipes at other leading Republican presidential candidates, including Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who was launching his campaign on Monday.

She specifically criticized a tax proposal put forward by Rubio, saying it would significantly cut taxes for households earning $3 million a year. "That's a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy," Clinton said. She also ripped into Walker, saying he was an example of a GOP governor who had "made their names stomping on workers' rights."

During a stop in New Hampshire last week, Bush had been discussing the high number of part-time workers listed among the roster of employed Americans, and the need for people to find more full-time employment. Democrats have seized upon the comments, hoping it will undermine the ability of the brother and son of U.S. presidents to connect with middle-class workers.

Allie Brandenburger, a Bush spokeswoman, said in response that Clinton was "proposing the same failed policies we have seen in the Obama economy, where the typical American household's income has declined and it's harder for businesses to hire and the middle class to achieve rising incomes."

Republicans note that under Obama, the workplace participation rate has declined to their lowest levels since 1977 and the labor force includes millions of people working in part-time jobs who would prefer working full-time.

In a sign of his stature in the GOP field, Bush received the brunt of Clinton's criticism. At one point, Clinton said the nation's economy should not be measured by "some arbitrary growth targets untethered to people's lives and livelihoods." That was a veiled reference to Bush, who has said he would set a goal of 4 percent economic growth, including 19 million jobs, if elected president, and would seek to harness innovation and technology.

Clinton, meanwhile, made no mention of her chief Democratic rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has wooed Democrats by making economic inequality the central plank of his insurgent campaign. But her message appeared aimed at liberals who have expressed anxiety about the uneven recovery of the economy since the Great Recession.

Clinton pointed to the economic progress during her husband's two terms in the 1990s and more recently under President Barack Obama. But she said that globalization and technological changes require the next president to take steps to help middle-class Americans participate in economic prosperity.

"Today is not 1993. It's not 2009. So we need solutions for the big challenges we face now," Clinton said.

She pointed to a laundry list of Democratic-leaning policy ideas, including more public investment in infrastructure projects like the construction of roads and bridges, advancing renewable energy and tax cuts for small business owners. Clinton also expressed support for an increase in the federal minimum wage, an overhaul to the tax code, and policies proposals related to child care, paid leave and paid sick days.

But in framing her economic vision, Clinton attempted to meet the demands of liberals within her own party who question her willingness to regulate Wall Street. Some of those Democrats have rallied behind Sanders and many progressives note that Clinton has received backing from the financial sector in past races and received lucrative speaking fees to address Wall Street conferences.

Clinton urged corporate leaders to "embrace their responsibilities" to workers, threatening tougher action against those who behave badly.

She vowed to expand the Dodd-Frank law passed by Congress in 2010, which tightened regulation of financial institutions. Clinton said the rules were "under assault" by Republicans — and advocated increased government oversight not only of the country's' biggest banks but of hedge funds, high-frequency traders, and other powerful financial players.

She leveled a subtle swipe against the Obama administration, which took no action against the individual financial titans who pursued risky fiscal practices that contributed to the 2008 financial crisis. Clinton promised criminal prosecutions of bad bankers.

She said financial figures too often "get off with limited consequences or none at all, even when they have already pocked the gains."

"This is wrong and on my watch it will change," she said. Clinton said she would offer plans to "rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and make sure stock markets work for everyday investors."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's economic framework will be followed by a series of speeches this summer to outline a number of economic proposals, including wage growth, college affordability, corporate accountability and paid leave. She plans to discuss the need for corporate profit-sharing during a stop in New Hampshire on Thursday.

Clinton's high-profile economic speech coincided with a courting of labor groups and Hispanic officials, who also are being wooed by Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley. Clinton received the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers union on Saturday and both Clinton and Sanders were holding private meetings with labor leaders later in the week.

The three Democratic contenders were addressing the National Council of La Raza conference in Kansas City later Monday, appealing to members of the nation's largest Latino advocacy organization.

Hillary Clinton Blames Republicans for Promoting Inequality // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 13, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday blamed Republicans for “35 years” of policies that have exacerbated income inequality by giving “more wealth to those at the top” through tax cuts and corporate loopholes.

“Twice now in the past 20 years a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess,” Mrs. Clinton said in New York, as she called for tax relief for middle-class families, an increase in collective bargaining and other incentives to raise middle-class wages.

“I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy — you can’t have one without the other,” she said.

In a speech intended to lay the groundwork for the economic message she will carry throughout her 2016 campaign, Mrs. Clinton singled out by name three of her potential Republican rivals: Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida.

Mrs. Clinton alluded to comments Mr. Bush made last week about Americans needing to work longer hours.

“Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the teacher who is in that classroom or the trucker who drives all night,” she said. “They don’t need a lecture, they need a raise.”

Mr. Bush later clarified that he was referring to the 6.5 million Americans “stuck in part-time work” who haven’t been able to find a full-time job. A spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Mrs. Clinton called Mr. Rubio’s economic plan a “sure budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy” and said Mr. Walker had embraced “meanspirited, misguided attacks” on worker’s rights in clashing with unions in Wisconsin. Mr. Walker later responded with a statement saying, “Hillary Clinton thinks you grow the economy in Washington. I think the American people grow the economy in cities, towns, and villages across the U.S.”

And Republican officials warned that Mrs. Clinton’s approach will cost the taxpayer.

“It’s pretty clear: she will have to raise taxes on American families,” Allison Moore, a spokeswoman for the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican National Committee, said of Mrs. Clinton's proposals. "There's no way around it."

The singling out of Republican candidates was sprinkled into a wide-ranging and at times dense policy speech that presented the goal posts of the economic agenda Mrs. Clinton would advance in her administration.

The policies, intended to "drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families," ranged from relatively new ideas, like incentives for corporations to increase profit sharing, and populist ones, like criminalizing misconduct in the financial industry.

Mrs. Clinton included an extended plea to empower labor unions in collective bargaining, saying that the "decline of unions may be responsible for a third of the inequality among men."

She also called on eliminating the loophole that allows for lower taxation of carried interest (profits that a private equity adviser makes from investing in companies), reining "in excessive risks on Wall Street," and giving regulators greater power to oversee big banks and the so-called "shadow banking" industry of hedge funds and private equity firms.

"I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that 'too big to fail' is still too big a problem," she said.

The speech was the result of months of conversations with policy advisers that long predated the official announcement of her candidacy in April. And her remarks were a work-in-progress until the minute she delivered them, according to multiple advisers who helped craft the address.

Earlier versions of the speech included criticism of only Mr. Bush and Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, and did not go as far as the final draft in plans to criminalize bad players in the financial sector, according to these advisers, who could only discuss private discussions without attribution.

Among the many advisers who weighed in was Gary Gensler, the campaign's chief financial officer and a former Wall Street regulator known for his aggressive streak, who helped persuade Mrs. Clinton's to go further in her remarks on financial industry regulation.

"Those rules have been under assault by Republicans in Congress and those running for president," Mrs. Clinton said.

The remarks are intended to appease the liberal base of the Democratic Party, as one of Mrs. Clinton's opponents, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, surges in the polls with his socialist message.

At one point a protester interrupted Mrs. Clinton in the auditorium of the New School, yelling a question about whether she would reinstate the Glass-Steagall Act. President Bill Clinton signed legislation that repealed parts of Glass-Steagall in 1999, leading to the commingling of commercial and investment banking, a move widely criticized by some liberals.

But those regulations seem increasingly antiquated in a financial industry defined by the emergence of a "shadow banking" sector including hedge funds and high-frequency traders that have thrived in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The problems are not limited to the big banks that get all the headlines," Mrs. Clinton said. "Serious risks are emerging from institutions in the so-called shadow banking system."

Another economic adviser to Mrs. Clinton, Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel laureate in economics who has written extensively about inequality, said "the speech showed a clear understanding that our economy is not working for most Americans" and that "we need to fundamentally rewrite the rules."

Hillary Clinton Speech Is Not Expected to Dwell on Wall Street // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 13, 2015

In a speech in Lower Manhattan during the 2008 Democratic primaries, Hillary Rodham Clinton assailed Wall Street for its role in a subprime mortgage crisis that was months away from becoming the worst financial meltdown since the Great Depression.

On Monday, Mrs. Clinton will again choose the area for a major economic address. But this time, speaking at the New School, she will only briefly touch on Wall Street, regulation and the financial industry.

Mrs. Clinton is expected to focus on the economic problem she believes is most urgent today: wages for low- and middle-class wage earners that have remained virtually stagnant for 15 years even as the overall economy has grown.

Economists call it "the great wage slowdown" of the 21st century, and Mrs. Clinton, who expressed foresight in her proposals for regulating derivatives and subprime mortgages months before the financial crisis hit, believes the wage slowdown and the income inequality it has caused is the fundamental economic challenge facing the country, according to aides who provided a preview of her remarks.

The speech comes at a critical time for Mrs. Clinton, when one of her Democratic opponents in the 2016 race, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has surged in the polls and drawn big crowds with his populist message.

Her speech won't be in the same populist vein, aides said.

Rather, she will lean heavily on proposals like paid family leave, incentives for corporations to expand profit sharing to employees, and an increase in the minimum wage. Mrs. Clinton will also come down hard on corporations (including Wall Street firms) that she will argue are too focused on quarterly returns to shareholders rather than on long-term investment in employees. She will call on the wealthiest Americans to pay more in taxes to help the country bridge the growing disparity between the top 1 percent of earners and a vast majority of Americans.

The speech will be a blueprint for the policies she plans to talk about over the course of the campaign. But liberals looking for Mrs. Clinton to repeat her earlier economic speech, casting blame on the financial industry and providing detailed policies that would affect the big banks, may be disappointed.

As one Clinton aide cautioned: "This is not her Wall Street speech."

Hillary Clinton, Unapologetic Grandma // NYT // Anna North – July 13, 2015

The question surfaced as soon as Chelsea Clinton announced her pregnancy: Would becoming a grandmother dim Hillary Clinton's presidential ambitions?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her speech on Monday offered a pointed answer.

“Last year, while I was at the hospital here in Manhattan waiting for little Charlotte to make her grand entrance,” she said, “one of the nurses said, ‘Thank you for fighting for paid leave.’” That anecdote, part of a larger promise to increase women’s participation in the labor force by improving leave for parents and caregivers, was only Mrs. Clinton’s first mention of her granddaughter.

She brought her up again in the context of early childhood development: “80 percent of your brain is physically formed by age of three. That’s why families like mine read, talk, and sing endlessly to our granddaughter.”

And again to highlight the need for long-term change in Washington: “Maybe it’s the grandmother in me, but I believe that part of public service is planting trees under whose shade you’ll never sit.”

She even let Charlotte close the show, leaving the audience “with one more thought”: “I want every child, every child in our country, not just the granddaughter of a former President or a former secretary of state, but every child to have the chance to live up to his or her God-given potential.”

Not only will Mrs. Clinton not be bowing out of the presidential race to care for her grandchild, she’s made her grandmother status central to her message — one that, if Monday’s speech is any guide, will present equal pay and paid leave as issues of crucial importance to the whole economy, not just to women.

Some of the focus on her grandchild may be calculated to make Mrs. Clinton seem warmer and more relatable (the standard of relatability for her has long been higher than it is for male politicians).

But given the speculation that surrounded and even preceded Charlotte’s birth, and the lack of respect generally afforded older women in America, asserting oneself as both grandmother and candidate still feels groundbreaking.

As her campaign moves forward, Mrs. Clinton is sure to receive criticism based on or compounded by her gender — on Monday, she looked prepared to address it head-on.

Clinton to lay out economic vision in New York speech, will point to husband’s 2 terms // AP // Ken Thomas – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton is laying out her most concrete vision for the U.S. economy on Monday in a pitch to Democrats who are being wooed by her chief rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders, and a larger electorate assessing the 2016 presidential field.

Clinton will emphasize the need for policies to increase real income of everyday Americans. Clinton is also expected to use the speech to portray a large field of Republicans as beholden to tax cuts and quick fixes that will fail to jumpstart wages.

Clinton will encourage companies to offer profit-sharing with their employees, and will point to potential changes in the tax code to help workers benefit, her campaign said Monday.

Aides said she would outline plans for more public investment in infrastructure projects like the construction of roads and bridges, advancing renewable energy and tax cuts for small business owners. Clinton is also expected to support an increase in the federal minimum wage.

Clinton's economic speech coincides with a courting of labour groups and Hispanic officials by Clinton, Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley. Clinton received the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers union on Saturday.

Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist who has risen in recent Democratic polls, said in an interview with CBS on Sunday that he planned to address poverty in the coming weeks and reach out to voters in conservative states in the South.

The three Democratic contenders were addressing the National Council of La Raza conference later Monday, appealing to members of the nation's largest Latino advocacy organization.

In her New York address, Clinton will point to the economic progress during her husband's two terms in the 1990s and more recently under President Barack Obama. But she will note that globalization and technological changes require the next president to take steps to help middle-class Americans participate in economic prosperity.

Clinton will also attempt to meet the demands of liberals within her own party who are wary of her willingness to regulate Wall Street. Some have rallied behind Sanders, who has made economic inequality the central focus of his campaign.

Republicans said Clinton was simply offering a prescription for a bigger government role in the economy.

Clinton has sought to undermine the entire Republican field, including Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, as supporters of "top-down" economic policies and large tax breaks for the wealthy.

Clinton goes heavy on economic politics, light on policy // Politico // Annie Karni and Glenn Thrush – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton delivered her first major economic speech of the 2016 race on Monday — an attempt to address the threat posed by Bernie Sanders' populist crusade without being pinned to a set of liberal proposals that will hurt her in a general election.

The 45-minute speech at Manhattan's New School — among the most liberal schools in the country — was billed as a major policy address, but it was an unmistakably political broadside that hit on the major points of Clinton's announcement speech and didn't match Sanders' own specificity on key issues like hiking tax rates for the rich or opposing the Obama administration's Pacific trade deal negotiations.

Instead, she laid out an economic agenda for the country focused on increasing wages for the middle class, while drawing specific contrasts with the top contenders in the Republican field — calling out former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio by name. She made no mention of Sanders.

And she took an indirect swipe at her ally President Barack Obama, saying she would explore new ways to hold individuals accountable for shenanigans on Wall Street that lead to economic crises — a clear reference to the dearth of criminal prosecutions of financial-sector executives under Obama's longtime attorney general Eric Holder.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said she would not hesitate to prosecute individuals in the finance sector who commit fraud, while also instituting incentives for companies to share profits with their workers, and creating an economy that works for "the struggling, the striving, and the successful."

Clinton said that raising incomes for Americans to afford a middle-class life was the "defining economic challenge of our time. … The evidence is in," she said later in the speech. "Inequality is a drag on our entire economy. This is the problem we need to tackle."

In laying out proposals to encourage both "growth and fairness" in the economy — encouraging small business growth and setting up an infrastructure bank, while also talking about increasing the minimum wage and profit-sharing — Clinton's speech appeared to be an attempt to unite the centrist and populist economic wings of her own party.

But she avoided some of the most controversial populist ideas, such as increasing the federal minimum wage to $15, significantly raising corporate tax rates or expanding Social Security for all.

She reiterated her support for the Warren Buffett rule, "to make sure millionaires don't pay lower rates than their secretaries." She said she supports closing the carried interest loophole, which allows wealthy financiers to pay a lower tax rate.

"While institutions have paid large fines, too often it seems that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences, or none at all, even when they have pocketed the gains," she said about Wall Street prosecutions. "This is wrong. On my watch, this will change." She said she would rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and make sure the stock market works for "everyday investors," not just high-frequency traders.

She said the country needs to go beyond Dodd-Frank regulations of major financial institutions and warned that "serious risks are emerging from institutions in the so-called shadow banking system," including hedge funds, high-frequency traders and nonbank financial companies.

In terms of profit-sharing, she said: "I'm not talking about charity, I'm talking about clear-eyed capitalism. Many companies have prospered by improving wages and training their workers."

On trade, Clinton did not get more specific than she has in the past, saying "we do need to set a high bar for trade agreements."

Creating a contrast with the Republican field, Clinton criticized Bush for his comment that Americans need to work longer hours (Bush later clarified he was talking about the amount of part-time workers seeking full-time work). "Well, he must not have met very many American workers," she said. "Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day, or the teacher in the classroom, or the trucker who drives all night. Let him tell that to the fast-food workers marching in the streets for better pay … they don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

She called out Rubio for cutting taxes for the super-wealthy, saying his plan is to "cut taxes for households making around $3 million a year by almost $240,000, which is way more than three times the earnings of a typical family." She said a priority is reforming the country's Tax Code.

And she blasted Walker — who officially entered the 2016 contest Monday morning — for "stomping on workers' rights." She said she will fight back against "these mean-spirited and misguided attacks."

Clinton's speech was interrupted toward the end by a heckler who called out to her, "Sen. Clinton, will you restore Glass-Steagall," a reference to legislation that creates distance between traditional banks and investments banks that was repealed by the Clinton administration in the 1990s. The heckler was escorted out of the auditorium by security, while the audience stood and applauded to drown out the disruption.

What Hillary Clinton gets wrong about job creation // Politico // Danny Vinik – July 13, 2015

In her first major speech on the economy Monday, Hillary Clinton stood in front of a crowd in Manhattan and declared her unwavering loyalty to small business. "Small businesses create more than 60 percent of new American jobs on net, so they have to be a top priority," she said at the New School. "I've said I want to be the small business president, and I mean it."

Clinton isn't the first candidate to profess her commitment to small businesses, and she won't be the last. Backing small businesses has become a rite of passage for presidential candidates of both parties.

Mitt Romney in 2012 said "We have to champion small business in this country." Then-candidate Barack Obama released a Small Business Rescue Plan in 2008 "so that we're extending our hand to the shops and restaurants; the start-ups and small firms that create jobs and make our economy grow." In his June announcement speech, Jeb Bush bragged that Florida was number one in small business creation during his time as governor.

It's great to have such wide agreement on an issue, but there's just one problem: Clinton, Romney, Obama and Bush are all wrong. Small businesses certainly matter, but they're not the drivers of job creation that everyone thinks they are.

The 60 percent figure has become gospel in politics. But the best research now suggests that jobs come from new businesses, not just small ones. Though there's overlap, those two groups of companies aren't the same. And the constant refrain of "small business" only serves to distract lawmakers from the actual job creators and policies needed to promote them.

The Small Business Administration promotes the 60 percent figure, which comes from a 2012 SBA report. But when economists John C. Haltiwanger, Javier Miranda and Ron S. Jarmin used Census Bureau data to try to determine where new jobs really come from, and controlled for firm age, the relationship between firm size and job growth disappeared. They found that new firms are the real job creators in the economy. In 2005, for instance, startups created 3.5 million net new jobs—a million more than were created in the entire private sector. In other words, non-startup businesses were responsible that year for a 1 million job decline in employment.

It's true that most new firms are also small. According to the SBA, "small business" encompasses 99 percent of companies in America. But most of them aren't new, and aren't adding jobs.

"Because new firms tend to be small, the finding of a systematic inverse relationship between firm size and net growth rates in prior analyses is entirely attributable to most new firms being classified in small size classes," the authors write.

If you care about new businesses, this might actually be a time to worry. Entrepreneurship rates have been declining for years, and economists aren't quite sure why. But they do have a few ideas for how to create more startups in America, such as passing immigration reform to bring in more high-tech workers and reforming U.S. patent laws to protect small companies from being dragged into court by patent trolls.

And some policies designed to help small businesses can actually hurt new ones. For instance, many occupational licensing laws help protect small businesses like hair salons and barber shops, but make it considerably more expensive to start new firms.

Clinton's speech wasn't bad for new businesses: she promised to cut red tape and offer easier access to capital for entrepreneurs.

But she's unlikely to shift her rhetoric anytime soon. Americans like the idea of their leaders fighting for mom-and-pop shops, and they like thinking that those shops are what drives American job growth. Until that changes, you can expect politicians across the political spectrum to keep mentioning it.

"Chalk this up to the fact that all politicians must, by unspoken law, and regardless of their economic validity, praise small business, a strong dollar, and balanced budgets," Jared Bernstein, a senior fellow at the left-leaning Center for Budget and Policy Priorities and former top economist for Vice President Joe Biden, wrote in an email. Of Clinton, whose campaign he has spoken with informally, he wrote: "The fact that she hit only one of those three is actually pretty good!"

Clinton speech react: 'Is that it?' // Politico // Ben White – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton gave a big economics speech here on Monday, and the snap reaction among Wall Street investors, economists and ardent financial reformers who thrill to the soak-the-rich rhetoric of Bernie Sanders was a collective: "Meh. What's next?"

Clinton laid out the soft contours of a "growth and fairness economy" in a speech designed to appeal to struggling middle-class workers with promises of higher pay and more generous federal policies.

But she left out many hard specifics on tougher tax policy toward the rich and corporate America. And she offered limited pledges to crack down on big Wall Street banks while hitting her strongest notes promising to toss rogue bankers in prison while ripping recent worker-productivity comments from former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

Despite those few moments, this was hardly Thomas Piketty invading the land of Wall Street titans and flipping over tables piled high with gold. And there were no radical new proposals aimed at reversing America's long slide into wage stagnation.

"She appears to have taken a page out of the Elizabeth Warren book on going after bankers and brokers and fat cats and people who may have broken the law," said Jack Ablin, chief investment office at BMO Private bank. "I'm sure a lot of polling went into that. But in terms of inequality and profit-sharing and general economic redistribution, she was a lot longer on problems than she was on solutions."

And Clinton sounded some of her by now very familiar themes, invoking her love of being a grandmother and arguing that middle-class wage stagnation since the end of the Great Recession was exacerbating income inequality while pledging that something must be done. But that something, according to Clinton, mainly consists of boosting the minimum wage and increasing overtime pay, something President Barack Obama has been pushing for some time.

Clinton also reiterated her long-held belief that the lower "carried interest" tax that some private equity and hedge fund managers pay on large chunks of their hefty take-home pay should be boosted to the ordinary income rate. But that was widely expected and not new. Wall Street mostly expects it will have to give up that benefit.

Clinton did gently push into some new ground by urging corporate America to share more of its record profits with average workers and not just top management. But Clinton offered little in the way of direct prescriptions for doing this, leaving that for future speeches.

“I will propose ways for companies to share more of their profits with employees,” Clinton said. “Later, in New Hampshire, I’ll have more to say about how we will do this.”

She also argued for tax relief for small businesses and broader corporate tax reform along with comprehensive immigration reform. But she did not go into specifics on any of these issues.

Other proposals also harkened back to Obama’s efforts, including an economic infrastructure bank to pay for much-needed upgrades to the U.S. transportation and communications systems. She again pressed for policies to address the pay gap between men and women, another familiar theme from the campaign trail, along with more early-childhood education.

Clinton perhaps hit her high point with a direct attack on recent comments from former Bush, who said last week that Americans need to “work longer hours” to increase economic growth. To significant applause, Clinton cited hard-working nurses and other Americans and said, “They don’t need a lecture. They need a raise.”

In a note that struck some as odd given the popularity of the services, Clinton specifically criticized “gig economy” companies, a group that includes upstarts such as Airbnb and Uber. These types of scrappy young companies have often provided corporate homes for former Obama administration officials. Former top Obama adviser David Plouffe is now a senior executive at Uber.

Defenders of Uber and companies like it say they are fighting entrenched and sluggish transportation incumbents such as cab companies. Getting rid of this opposition and allowing upstart companies to thrive would be a better path to faster growth than siding with their opponents, some analysts say.

“I think a lot of people view the sharing economy as a prime example of U.S. innovation and entrepreneurship,” said James Pethokoukis of the free market American Enterprise Institute. “They are breaking up these monopoly hotel chains and taxicab companies and allowing more people to provide not just great services but to provide more income to workers.”

Pethokoukis gave Clinton stronger marks for taking on corporate “short-termism” that focuses on quarterly earnings and stock buybacks rather than long-term investment. It’s an issue popular with Wall Street investors such as Larry Fink of Blackrock and tech investor Marc Andreessen, among others. “Republicans should look to get on board that issue as soon as possible,” Pethokoukis said.

Clinton also continued to straddle a middle ground on trade deals after strongly pushing for a free-trade agreement with Asia during her tenure as secretary of state. The halfway stance has enraged members of the Obama administration struggling to get the Asia deal done while also failing to excite ardent opponents of free trade deals on the left.

Many on the left strongly opposed to free trade and in favor of cracking down harder on Wall Street have gravitated to Sanders and, to a much lesser degree, former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley.

“Growth here at home and growth an ocean away are linked in a common global economy,” Clinton said on Monday. “Trade has been a major driver of the economy over recent decades, but it has also contributed to hollowing out our manufacturing base,” she said. “We do need to set a high bar for trade agreements, supporting them if they create jobs. … But we should be prepared to walk away if they don’t.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also found herself in a bit of a muddle as she praised the economy under her husband, former President Bill Clinton. But she did not note that Bill Clinton presided over the collapse of the Glass-Steagall wall between investment and commercial banking and unleashed a massively speculative market boom in technology stocks.

In perhaps her sharpest section, Clinton said that as a senator from New York, she learned “firsthand” the positive role Wall Street can play in growing the economy by helping innovators raise capital. But she also slammed bankers who “piled risk upon risk” heading into the crisis and cited her early calls to crack down on derivatives and subprime lending.

She pledged to both defend existing financial reform and go even further, almost hinting at a need to break up the largest banks, something sure to go down poorly with some of Clinton’s biggest supporters on Wall Street. “We have to go beyond Dodd-Frank; too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex. … I will offer plans to rein in excessive risk taking on Wall Street and ensure that stock markets work for everyday investors, not just high-speed traders.”

O’Malley last week issued specific proposals on this front. Clinton has yet to do so.

Financial reformers gave her mixed grades. “It’s a good start, but after all this listening, planning and thinking by the runaway leading candidate, I expected more,” said Dennis Kelleher of Better Markets, a pro-reform group. “The American people deserve a concrete, specific, comprehensive plan that really protects them from Wall Street recklessness and that she as president can be held accountable for once in office.”

Another financial reformer said the anti-Wall Street crowd was waiting to see whether Clinton will “put in place a team of advisers who have a demonstrated history of supporting meaningful reform and tough enforcement, or chooses instead to surround herself with the same crowd of revolving door insiders.”

The real test for Clinton on Wall Street will come when and if she turns this rhetoric into actual policy prescriptions. Big Wall Street titans heavily funding Clinton’s campaign and other business interests fully expect to take some heavy rhetorical hits as the Democratic front-runner fights off the Sanders surge. But they do not expect Clinton to try and fully reshape their industry.

Many conservatives breathed a sigh of relief after the speech, having feared a fresh set of innovative proposals that might have required serious responses. “I think it’s a horse race between what’s more tired, her or the material,” said Douglas Holtz-Eakin of the conservative American Enterprise Institute. “There really isn’t anything new here. It’s really more of the same, and I don’t understand how that would produce an outcome different from the last six or seven years.”

Hillary takes new shot at Jeb's 'longer hours' comment // Politico // Nick Gass – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton laid into Jeb Bush’s remark that Americans need to work longer hours on Monday during her first economic policy speech at the New School in New York City.

“Well, he must not have met very many American workers,” Clinton said to applause and cheers. “Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the teacher who is in that classroom, or the trucker who drives all night. It's not the first time Clinton's campaign has taken a shot at that remark. Her campaign tweeted a graph by the left-leaning Economic Policy Institute showing stagnating wages as productivity has risen over the last four decades.

Clinton also took shots at Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is set to formally announce his campaign later Monday.

Rubio's tax-cutting plan would be a "sure budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy," she said, "and that's the kind of bad economics you are likely to hear from any of the candidates on the other side."

She blasted Republican governors like Walker who "have made their names stomping on workers' rights, and practically all the Republican candidates hope to do the same as president."

Clinton bashes Wall Street, pledges U.S. income equality // Reuters // Luciana Lopez and Jonathan Allen – July 13, 2015

U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton took swipes at Wall Street and her Republican rivals on Monday, promising to impose tougher regulations on banks and raise the wages of ordinary Americans if she wins the 2016 White House race.

Under pressure from a campaign rival on the left, Clinton said she would appoint strict overseers to ensure that financial institutions never again indulge in the risky behavior that helped cause the 2008 banking crash.

In an address that her campaign promoted as a major economic policy speech, the former secretary of state vowed that banks cannot be "too big to fail."

"As we all know in the years before the crash, financial firms piled risk upon risk, and regulators in Washington either couldn't or wouldn't keep up," she said at The New School, a liberal university in Manhattan's Greenwich Village.

"I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that too big to fail is still too big a problem," Clinton said.

She promised to go beyond the 2010 Dodd-Frank law that imposed stronger regulations on the financial industry.

A former first lady and U.S. senator, Clinton is the clear favorite to win the Democratic nomination for the November 2016 presidential election but is facing a challenge from Bernie Sanders, a Vermont senator and self-styled socialist who is drawing large crowds at campaign events.

Clinton put the fight for higher wages for everyday Americans at the heart of her economic agenda, although her speech was short on specific policy proposals.

She said the U.S. economy will only run at full steam when middle-class wages rise steadily along with executive salaries and company profits.

"Corporate profits are at near-record highs and Americans are working as hard as ever but paychecks have barely budged in real terms," Clinton said.

Stepping up attacks against Republican rivals for the White House, Clinton took a dig at former Florida Governor Jeb Bush who said last week that Americans should have the chance to work longer hours.

"They don't need a lecture, they need a raise," she said. Clinton also took Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker to task for his strong opposition to union collective bargaining. Walker announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination on Monday.

Clinton will unveil more specifics of her economic policy in a series of speeches in coming weeks as liberal Democrats flirting with Sanders seek more details of her plans on increasing the minimum wage, creating universal preschool and investing in infrastructure.

Putting some meat on the bones of her economic policy could divert focus from issues dragging on Clinton's popularity, including a controversy over her use of a private email account while she was America's top diplomat.

"I think substance is her friend on the campaign because she has credibility as a substantive person, with extensive experience. Thoughtful, innovative proposals are going to help her," said Democratic strategist Bill Carrick.

It remains unclear how Clinton's tough-sounding language might affect the deep ties she and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, have with Wall Street. Both have been handsomely paid for speeches by major finance and investment institutions in recent years, including Goldman Sachs and The Carlyle Group.

Hillary Clinton, who represented Wall Street as part of her constituency when she was a U.S. senator from New York, has long looked to people in the finance industry for large campaign donations.

Presidential contender Hillary Clinton will pledge to "reform" capital gains taxation in coming weeks as part of her plan to fight an excessive focus on quick profits in capital markets, according to a campaign talking points document seen by Reuters.

Clinton, the favorite to win the Democratic Party's nomination for the November 2016 election, will speak on Monday about her plan for the U.S. economy, which includes addressing income inequality and encouraging longer-term investment.

The campaign memo, intended to help supporters discuss her ideas with the media and would-be donors, was sent out in advance of that speech.

"In the coming weeks, she will outline specific policies—for example, by reforming capital gains taxation—that will seek to counter the effect of this short-term focus," the memo, a copy of which was shared by a recipient with Reuters, said.

Such a pledge would appear to be a shift from her position when she last campaigned for the party's nomination in 2008.

In a primary debate that year, she stood by legislation signed by her husband, Bill Clinton, in 1997 when he was president.

That law lowered the maximum taxation rate on capital gains, which are the profits made on selling capital assets such as shares or real estate, from 28 percent to 20 percent. In 2003, the maximum rate was lowered further still to 15 percent under President Geoorge W. Bush.

"I wouldn't raise it above the 20 percent if I raised it at all," she said in the 2008 debate. "I would not raise it above what it was during the Clinton administration."

In 2012, the top capital gains taxation rate was raised back up to 20 percent for the wealthiest earners. For a period in the 1970s, the maximum taxation rate for long-term capital gains was almost 40 percent.

Clinton, who will say on Monday that the best way to increase the size of the U.S. economy is to increase middle-class people's incomes according to her campaign, hinted at her change of heart on capital gains at a campaign event in April.

Capital gains were intended to be "a way to reward people who made risky investments," she said at an event with voters in New Hampshire, "and now it is just being churned."

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy. You can't have one without the other," she said at The New School university in Manhattan's Greenwich Village, a bastion of liberal education.

With one eye on the growing support for Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-described socialist who is also seeking the Democratic Party nomination, Clinton laid out a vision of economic equality.

"Corporate profits are at near-record highs and Americans are working as hard as ever but paychecks have barely budged in real terms. Families today are stretched in so many directions and so are their budgets," Clinton said.

The former secretary of state promised to push for a broader reform of the U.S. corporate tax code.

Clinton is the favorite to win the Democratic nomination for the November 2016 presidential election but Sanders has drawn large crowds at campaign events in Iowa.

Wall Street will be watching Clinton's speech closely for hints of whether she will call for tougher financial regulation as her campaign develops. Rivals Sanders and Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, have urged a breakup of big banks but Clinton has not done so.

The former first lady will say that technology has created new business opportunities but also threatens to kill middle-class jobs, benefits and protections.

Clinton is likely to dismiss, at least indirectly, a pledge by leading Republican candidate Jeb Bush who says he will virtually double the U.S. economy's annual growth rate to 4 percent.

Republican presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina, a former Silicon Valley chief executive, said Clinton would damage businesses and fail to close the income gap.

"Every policy she is pursuing will make income inequality worse, not better, crony capitalism even worse, not better. And meanwhile, we will continue to crush the businesses that create jobs and middle-class families," Fiorina told ABC's "This Week" television show on Sunday.

Hillary Clinton Runs as Obama-Plus // Bloomberg // Francis Wilkinson – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton's speech today on the economy was more of a table-setter than a genuine policy repast. The outline was bold while the details were mostly left for other days. But her words made one thing clear: The 2016 presidential campaign will feature even more partisan polarization than the 2012 one did.

In May, Clinton suggested that she would not only protect President Barack Obama's executive actions on immigration, which are currently tied up in court, but she would do even more than Obama has to protect settled undocumented immigrants in the U.S. "If Congress refuses to act, as president I would do everything possible under the law to go even further," Clinton said.

Clinton's speech today, at Manhattan's New School, essentially confirmed her pitch to be "Obama-plus."

"If you work hard, you ought to be paid fairly," she said. "So we have to raise the minimum wage and implement President Obama's new rules on overtime. And then we have to go further."

On health care, she promised to "protect the Affordable Care Act -- and build on it."

Wall Street? As president, she would fight efforts to undermine Obama-era financial regulations and work to "protect the reforms we've made," she said. Oh, and while she's busy guarding the president's reforms, "We also have to go beyond Dodd-Frank."

A campaign promising a policy menu of Obama-plus should rally Democrats -- and give the party's most liberal activists less cause to swoon over Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders. But it also will expand the gulf between the Democratic and Republican nominees even beyond the gap between Obama and Mitt Romney in 2012. Presuming the 2016 Republican nominee's platform roughly resembles Romney's, the distance between Clinton and any GOP opponent -- even one with a more immigrant-friendly policy than "self-deportation" -- will be vast. Among other battle lines, the 2016 campaign is shaping up to be a stark competition between (Democratic) labor and (Republican) capital.

On rare occasions, Clinton has distanced herself from Obama. On Syria, she criticized the chaos in the region and leaned right by suggesting Obama should have been more aggressive in intervening in the conflict. On teachers and education policy, she has been coy. On trade, she has been noncommittal about the Pacific trade deal that Obama is negotiating, while hinting that a deal might be too costly to American workers. "Trade has been a major driver of the economy over recent decades but it has also contributed to hollowing out our manufacturing base and many hardworking communities," she said today. "So we do need to set a high bar for trade agreements."

Clinton has a freer hand discussing economics than Obama had in 2012, when his campaign was shadowed by sluggish, post-Great-Recession growth. She already has an easier time attacking Republican economic policy head-on. Speaking of 1993 and 2009, when Democrats last took over the presidency from Republicans, she said, "Twice now in the past 20 years, a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess. I think the results speak for themselves."

In 2008, Clinton ran as the hardheaded pragmatist against Obama's dreamy idealist. Now she is saying she will secure his hard-won policy gains, and build on them. Given the likelihood of a Republican House of Representatives, a Clinton White House would find it easier to secure than build. Either way, Obama is the foundation.

A Sneak Peek at Clinton's Capital Gains Tax Plan // Bloomberg // Richard Rubin – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton suggested Monday that she may endorse lower capital gains taxes on long-held assets as a way to discourage a quick-profits mentality in the U.S. economy.

That could mean a sliding scale of tax rates on investments, offering a tax break to patient investors while continuing to subject the profits from fast trades to the highest marginal tax rates. Today's system, by contrast, features a preferential tax rate on assets held more than a year. But it makes no distinction beyond that. Gains on stocks held for 366 days are taxed at the same rate as those held 36 years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I will soon be proposing a new plan to reform capital gains taxes to reward longer-term investments that create jobs, more than just quick trades," Clinton said during an economic policy speech in New York.

Clinton didn't offer further details, and her campaign didn't immediately respond to questions, but Neera Tanden, one of her most prominent outside advisers, last month proposed a sliding-scale capital gains tax in which the rate would decline the longer an asset is held.

"Once an investor holds a share past the one-year mark, the tax code provides no incentives to maintain the position any longer," Tanden and investor Blair Effron of Centerview Partners wrote. "A sliding-scale capital gains tax would involve more time horizons, extend further into the future, and avoid the kinds of kinks in tax schedules that policy wonks hate."

Under current law, the top capital gains tax rate on assets held for less than a year is 43.4 percent. That rate drops to 23.8 percent for assets held more than a year.

If this proposal sounds familiar, it is. President Bill Clinton signed a law in 1997 that would have imposed an 18 percent top capital gains tax rate on assets purchased after 2000 and held for at least five years. The Bush tax cuts of 2003 erased that idea and replaced it with lower rates for all.

It's also unclear how big a practical effect a sliding-scale tax rate would have. Many stocks already aren't subject to taxes at all because they're held by university endowments, retirement accounts and pension funds.

Unlike Republicans who have proposed eliminating the capital gains tax, Clinton has a proposal that would limit how much the wealthiest households could benefit from lower capital gains taxes.

She backs the Buffett Rule, an Obama policy named for billionaire (and Clinton backer) Warren Buffett that calls for a minimum 30 percent tax on the highest-income households. Depending on where she sets the capital gains rates, the Buffett Rule could claw back some of the benefits.

Clinton's reference to "quick trades" is "silly'" because the fastest trades are subject to high tax rates already, said Malcolm Salter, a Harvard Business School professor who has proposed a gradually declining tax rate for capital gains that would hit zero after five years. Still, he said, the idea of preferential capital gains tax rates for long-held assets has promise as a way of encouraging companies to change executive compensation practices. And, he said, it could shift the political discussion on capital gains out of the usual back-and-forth debate between the merits of the growth that could be spurred by lower rates and the revenue that would be lost to the Treasury.

But Salter questioned whether Clinton's middle road—offering investors a break on capital gains taxes in return for more long-term investments—is salable in the current political environment. The idea should be raised, he said, in the context of a broader discussion about the "institutional corruption that's eating away at the core" of American capitalism. "The Democrats would have a very difficult time trying to sell this because most people don't understand what's at stake," said Salter, who said he hasn't been in touch with Clinton's team.

That "quick trades" line also drew a quick rebuke from another target of Clinton—the private equity industry. Clinton's move to tax carried interest as ordinary income, not capital gains, is at odds with her stated desire for patient investing, said Steve Judge, president of the Private Equity Growth Capital Council. "Taxing long-term carried interest as anything other than a long-term capital gain would deprive private equity, venture capital, real estate, and many other businesses of the same treatment available to other kinds of businesses that sell a long-term capital asset for a profit," he said.

It's not clear if Clinton will back the changes to capital gains taxation that President Barack Obama proposed earlier this year.

The president wants to raise the top tax rate to 28 percent and change a rule that lets people pass appreciated assets to their heirs at death without paying income taxes on the gains.

Behind Hillary Clinton's High Praise for a Republican Wall Street Guru // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – July 13, 2015

In Hillary Rodham Clinton's speech Monday morning at the New School, the first major address of her 2016 presidential campaign to focus on the economy, she spoke for middle-class workers and against trickle-down policies. Clinton's aides had previously indicated that the focus would not be on Wall Street and the need to regulate the financial industry—she may be feeling the effects of Bernie Sanders's momentum, but she has not suddenly become him—and yet some among the liberal wing of the Democratic party might have found themselves surprised by a suggestion concerning Terrence Duffy, the executive chairman and president of futures market operator CME group and a registered Republican.

Clinton said, "We should listen to Terry Duffy."

In her address on lifting wages, Clinton cited an op-ed Duffy published two years ago in the Wall Street Journal that, she said, "really caught my attention. He wrote, and I quote: 'I'm concerned that those of us in financial services have forgotten who we serve—and that the public knows it… Some Wall Streeters can too easily slip into regarding their work as a kind of money-making game divorced from the concerns of Main Street.'"

Duffy's op-ed centered on the diminishing numbers of Ivy-League graduates entering financial firms. He said:

In 2008, Harvard sent 28% of its graduating class to firms where they would become bankers, traders or investors. By 2010, Harvard was sending just 17% of its graduating class. Yale graduates entering the finance business fell to 14% from 26% during the same period. Even Princeton, traditionally the most finance-friendly school, fell to 35.5% from 40%.

Wall Street was losing young peoples' trust. It had to show talented minds "what makes people tick," had to show them the value of the wealth sector. Duffy concluded, "We have to make the case to young people that if you want a remarkable career at a company with integrity that helps people and influences the world, then come to Wall Street."

Of all the ways for a politician to underline the importance of remembering and honoring the people you serve, quoting Duffy's op-ed was a peculiar one. But a look at Clinton's relationship with Duffy, who made $6.7 million last year, might explain why.

Duffy may be a registered Republican, but he is a Clinton supporter as well. He endorsed Clinton in her 2008 run, saying, "We need a president like Hillary Clinton who understands the important role that financial markets play in our global economy." He added, "Like no other candidate, Hillary Clinton crosses party lines to combine the visionary leadership and pragmatic problem-solving skills that this country needs in its President." He gave the maximum contribution of $4,600 to her 2008 campaign.

Duffy declined comment for this article, though Anita Liskey, the managing director of communications at CME, confirmed his current party registration. She told me, of Duffy's relationship with Clinton, "He knows her well and he's obviously pleased that she mentioned his piece."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

E-mails released last week by the State Department show evidence of this relationship, as Bloomberg's Jennifer Epstein and Ben Brody have detailed. Duffy asked Clinton to stop by a dinner he was hosting for "150 or so folks from the exchange," and she in turn asked an aide to help find a moment for Duffy's group to visit the State Department. He was the conduit through which Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican rival in the presidential race, sent greetings.

Their e-mails have taken a more personal tone, as well. In May 2009, as Bloomberg's Zachary Mider reported, Duffy e-mailed Clinton to invite her to a company event, and added, "You're doing an incredible job." In September came another invitation—and additional words of praise. "Once again," he wrote, "you're doing an amazing job." She responded this time that she would try hard to be there, and later apologized for the delay. "I've been hip deep in the rollout of the Afghanistan strategy," Clinton said, "I hope you, your family, and the futures markets are all well!"

In 2010, when Duffy was being honored by the American Friends of Hebrew University, he asked Clinton to deliver the keynote (she was unable; the conservative columnist George Will did instead).

But in November 2013, Clinton traveled to the beachside Ritz-Carlton Resort of Naples, Florida, to deliver the keynote at the CME Group's Global Financial Leadership Conference—an annual event that Duffy has called the "Davos of Derivatives."

The group featured some highlights of Clinton's appearance that day, for which she was paid, alongside men like former U.K. Prime Minister Gordon Brown, former Commodities Futures Trading Commission Chairman Gary Gensler, former Governor of the Central Bank of Cyprus Athanasios Orphanides, former members of the European Central Bank executive board Lorenzo Bini Smaghi and Jurgen Stark.

OpenMarkets, the company's online magazine, shows a picture of Duffy and Clinton side by side onstage. The caption reads, "CME Group Executive Chairman and President Terry Duffy leads a Q&A with Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton about America's economic and political challenges."

Fact-Checking Hillary Clinton's Economic Attacks on Top Republican Rivals // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton launched direct attacks on three of her top Republican rivals Monday in the first major economic speech of her presidential campaign, setting the table for what will be the defining policy debate of the 2016 election.

Here's what she said during the address at the New School in New York City, and how her claims stack up to the facts.

Jeb Bush

Clinton took a pointed shot at the former Florida governor's eyebrow-raising remarks last week to the New Hampshire Union Leader that "people need to work longer hours" in order to boost their income.

"He must not have met very many American workers," the Democratic front-runner said, adding that "they don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton and Bush have already tussled over his comment, which Democrats jumped on to paint the ex-governor as an out-of-touch elitist, pointing out that Americans work longer hours than almost all of the developed world. Bush's quote seemed open to that interpretation, but he prefaced it by saying "[w]orkforce participation has to rise," suggesting he meant too few people work full-time. He labeled the attack an "out-of-context" reading, saying he wants people who are involuntarily stuck in part-time jobs to have opportunities to work full-time.

Bernie Sanders, a fellow Democratic presidential candidate who also criticized Bush, said last week on CNN: "If he is talking about the need for more full-time jobs rather than part-time jobs, he's absolutely right, that's what we have to do."

Marco Rubio

"Senator Rubio's [plan] would cut taxes for households making around $3 million a year by almost $240,000, which is way more than three times the earnings of a typical family," Clinton said. "Well, that's a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy, and that's the kind of bad economics you're likely to hear from any of the candidates on the other side."

The basis of Clinton's criticism is an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, of a proposal by Utah Senator Mike Lee. Rubio, the junior senator from Florida, has since joined Lee as a partner. "Those in the top 0.1 percent, who make $3.3 million and up, would be in line for an average tax cut of $240,000—a boost in after-tax income of 3.8 percent," TPC found.

In other words, it's not necessarily true that those in the lower end of that group—"around $3 million"—would get a tax break of as much as $240,000. Clinton's campaign website describes it more accurately by saying: "Senator Rubio's plan would cut taxes for households making above $3 million a year by almost $240,000" (emphasis added).

That said, Rubio's overall tax break for upper earners could be much bigger than Clinton described, depending on a household's mix of capital and wage income. A newer version of the Rubio-Lee plan eliminates all capital gains and dividend taxation. According to the Tax Foundation, another, more right-leaning think tank, the top 1 percent would have an average increase in after-tax income (another way of saying tax cut) of 11.5 percent.

Scott Walker

"Republican governors like Scott Walker," Clinton said, "have made their names stomping on workers' rights, and practically all the Republican candidates hope to do the same as president. I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

Heated political rhetoric aside, there's not much to fact check here. Her underlying premise is correct that the Wisconsin governor's ticket to stardom on the right was taking on public sector unions, most notably by ending their collective bargaining rights. It has been a defining feature of Walker's tenure, leading to a failed recall election against him, and it is a fight he is touting as a selling point to Republican voters.

As to Clinton's other assertion, Republicans won't like her framing, but their party is unabashedly aligned against unions that seek to bolster workers' clout against their employers. Richard Trumka, the president of the large labor union AFL-CIO, on Monday labeled Walker a "national disgrace," an attack that one Republican operative said was a "badge of honor."

Hillary Clinton to Propose Incentives for Corporate Profit Sharing // Bloomberg News // Jennifer Epstein – July 13, 2015 with employees as she outlines her broader economic vision for the United States, which centers on policies aimed at boosting the wages of middle-class workers, her campaign said.

“Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce,” Clinton plans to say in New York during the first major economic policy speech of her three-month-old presidential bid, according to excerpts provided by her campaign.

More widespread corporate profit-sharing “will be good for workers and good for business,” she will say. “Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company’s success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees’ pockets. It’s a win-win.”

The Democratic front-runner has hinted at the idea before, saying last month that she hopes to create “new incentives” for companies to share profits with more employees than just their top executives. A Clinton aide said the candidate will offer up changes to the tax code to encourage companies to participate, but did not say what those changes would be.

Clinton's Monday speech, to be delivered at the New School, a progressive university in Greenwich Village, is a big-picture survey of her views on the economy as a whole that will offer an introduction to policy proposals that she will detail in the coming weeks. She'll start on Thursday with a rollout of the profit-sharing plan during a campaign stop in New Hampshire, the aide said.

Hillary Clinton Says She'll Focus on Growing the Middle Class // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Monday outlined a plan for economic growth focused on the middle class, in one of the first major policy speeches of her presidential campaign.

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy. You can’t have one without the other," the Democratic front-runner said at New York's New School, a university known as a liberal think tank on economics and foreign policy. "We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country. That will be my mission from the first day I'm president to the last."

The Democratic presidential front-runner's speech was a big-picture survey of her views on the economy offering an introduction to policy proposals that she will detail in the coming weeks, beginning Thursday with the rollout of her plan to encourage companies to share profits with their workers. Among other things, she said she will offer a capital gains tax that would create incentives for job creation over short-term profits. She also plans to encourage companies to share profits with employees, arguing that profit sharing "can boost productivity."

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," she said.

While Clinton's speech was rooted in policy, she was politically aggressive.

She went after former Florida Governor Jeb Bush's recent assertion that Americans should be working "longer hours" (which Democrats interpreted to mean Americans are not working enough, while the Republican presidential candidate has asserted that it was more about helping workers get the hours they want).

"He must not have met very many American workers ... they don't need a lecture, they need a raise," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also name-checked the newest entrant into the Republican presidential race, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, who announced his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination this morning on Twitter and will deliver his inaugural campaign speech this evening. "Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names by stomping on worker's rights" and their attacks are "mean-spirited and misguided," she said.

Clinton's plan is centered on three goals: boosting workforce participation and increasing public-private investments; rewarding work more fairly; and encouraging long-term thinking and sustainable business strategies.

Clinton pivots left in first economic address // McClatchy // Kevin Hall – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton is pivoting left of center in an economic address that is short on detail yet paints broad strokes of the themes she'll hit during her bid for the Democratic nomination and presidency.

In a speech delivered Monday morning at the New School, a self-described progressive university in the heart of Manhattan, Clinton struck themes such as boosting middle-class incomes, similar to a theme in President Barack Obama's 2012 campaign.

The Clinton campaign team highlighted what it called a novel proposal to expand company profit-sharing with employees, proposing a change in the tax code to make it happen.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," Clinton said in remarks released ahead of her speech where she announced the profit- sharing plan.

Clinton added that profit sharing "will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets. It's a win-win."

The issue of profit sharing fits neatly into the broader debate over Wall Street and who wins in America. Companies that are publicly traded are under pressure to show quarterly profits, often at the expense of investing for the long term. It also means that these profits flow to shareholders more than to stakeholders such as company employees.

Americans whose 401 K retirement plans invest in publicly traded companies benefit indirectly from corporate profits. But only 52 million workers have such retirement plans, so the benefits from corporate profits flow to the wealthy, who are more likely to be invested in financial markets.

Corporate profits in the first quarter of this year were up 9 percent over a 12-month period, although they dipped in the last two quarters because of the strengthening U.S. dollar, which made U.S. goods and services more expensive relative to other major currencies.

Hillary Clinton's New Mantra: It's the Wages, Stupid // TIME // Michael Scherer – July 13, 2015

It's the wages, stupid.

That's the magic sauce—in just four words—that Hillary Clinton believes will make her the next President of the United States. In a speech Monday to lay out her approach, she chose a more verbose version of the same message. “Wages need to rise to keep up with costs. Paychecks need to grow. Families who work hard and do their part deserve to get ahead and stay ahead,” she said. “The defining economic challenge of our time clear. We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans.”

As a theme, the approach is not new. A chart showing the divergence between median income growth and productivity growth over the last decade sat at the heart of Barack Obama’s 2012 campaign for President. “‘I’m working harder and falling behind,'” David Simas, Obama’s political strategist, explained after the 2012 election. “That was the North Star. Everything we did and everything we said was derivative of that sentiment.” As she spoke Monday, Clinton’s campaign tweeted out a version of the same chart that once hung at Obama’s Chicago campaign headquarters and now hangs in Simas’ West Wing office.

The difference now is that Clinton inherits a situation that is even more dire for American voters than the one that Obama struggled with over his past two campaigns, both of which promised improvement for middle class incomes that has yet to arrive. Even as the labor market has tightened in recent years and the national economy has continued to grow, wages have remained flat or, in many cases, declined.

A recent analysis of Census data by Democratic economist Robert J. Shapiro, whose work helped inform the Obama campaign’s approach, found that the economy shifted gears for American incomes after the 2001 recession. “Everybody declines from 2002 on relative to the 1980s and 1990s, and probably a majority of the country saw their incomes decline as they age,” he said, noting that unlike many economic indicators, this is one that voters feel directly. “It’s politically important because it’s people’s actual experience.” Shapiro found that the only two groups who saw their incomes increase on average between 2002 and 2013 were college graduates and households that were in their early 20s at the beginning of the decade.

To counteract this shift, Clinton proposed a variety of policy buckets she plans to focus on, many of which she did not detail. These include tax changes that will encourage large companies to share profits with employees, tax increases for the wealthy and new regulations of the financial sector. “The truth is the current rules for our economy do reward some work, like financial trading, for example much more than other work, like actually building and selling things, the work that has always been the backbone of our economy,” she said. “To get all incomes rising again, we need to strike a better balance.”

The focus on wages also gives a frame for Clinton to roll out a raft of other evergreen liberal policies, which could have indirect impacts on wage growth. These include better family leave policies to encourage more women to enter the workforce, lower health care costs, better early childhood education subsidies, more spending on infrastructure and “enhancing” Social Security.

Overall, the rhetoric draws heavily on the work of the left wing of the Democratic Party, including Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Clinton Administration economist Joseph Stiglitz. Though Clinton stopped short of calling for redistribution of wealth to combat inequality, a constant theme of the left, she did embrace the notion that the current economic stagnation for many Americans is a policy choice. “The choices we make in the years ahead will set the stage for what American life in the middle class and our economy will be like in this century,” she said.

At two points, Clinton contrasted her vision with the Obama Administration. First, she criticized the Justice Department and regulators for not being aggressive enough in prosecuting the misdeeds of financial firms. She also called for more financial regulation. “I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that too big to fail is still too big a problem,” she said, in a swipe at Obama, who has argued that the problem of too-big-to-fail was largely solved by financial reform in 2010.

Perhaps most important, the speech set up a contrast with Republican frontrunner Jeb Bush, who has laid out an economic vision of rising prosperity based on growing the whole economy by 4% annually, a target that few economists think can be reached. Clinton’s argument is that total growth is not enough. There also needs to be a reshuffling of the rules that makes the gains from that growth more widely distributed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The question for Clinton is much the same as the challenge faced by Obama. She may have diagnosed the disease in a way that the American people have endorsed in the past, but can she deliver the antidote? Republicans, who have a dramatically different world view, have been able to block many of Obama's reforms, and would likely have similar power under a Hillary Clinton Administration. There is also a skepticism, shared by many liberal economists, about just how much the reforms she laid out will impact incomes, which have been under pressure because technology and global competition have put a cap on prices and an increase in the unemployment rolls.

But that is a question for a later time. The first jobs for Clinton are to win the nomination and then the White House. And by borrowing heavily from her successful predecessor, her team believes she has a winning formula.

What to Know About Hillary Clinton's Economic Proposals // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton called Monday for "progressive, principled and pragmatic policies" aimed at boosting middle-class incomes, as she laid out her vision of the American economy in the first major policy speech of her presidential campaign.

It was a speech intended to capitalize on the surge of populism that has swept much of the country and excited the Democratic base, and also lay out a roadmap for the goals of a Clinton presidency.

Clinton delivered her speech as a series of policy solutions for problems she sees in the American economy. Republicans quickly dismissed them. "Hillary Clinton's entire economic pitch is built upon the false premise that Democrats have not occupied the White House for the past six and a half years—a period that has seen the weakest economic recovery in modern history, rising income inequality, an ever-shrinking middle class, and negative growth in the first 3 months of this year," Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short said in a statement.

Below is a cheat sheet of what Clinton says ails the economy, and how she says she'll fix it. Note that many of the details are missing, as Clinton says in the coming months she'll fill in the gaps with more policy speeches.

Problem as described by Clinton: Income inequality is a drag on the economy

Wealth inequality is slowing economic growth, Clinton said. It's not just a fairness issue, she said, but a practical one. "The evidence is in: inequality is a drag on our entire economy," Clinton said.

How she wants to fix it

-Raise the minimum wage. "If you work hard you should be compensated fairly," Clinton said. But unlike Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who have called for a $15 minimum wage, Clinton has not set a firm target for the wage.

-Crack down on employers who misclassify employees as contractors, and fight wage theft.

-Protect President Obama's health care reform law, lower health care costs and make prescription drugs more affordable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-Defend and “enhance” social security to make it easier to save for the future.

-Create tax incentives to encourage corporate profit-sharing for employees.

-Tighten the tax code to make sure “millionaires don’t pay lower [tax] rates than their secretaries” and closing tax loopholes.

-Support unions and the right to organize. “If we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting union workers,” Clinton said.

Problem as described by Clinton: America needs to create more jobs and grow the economy

“More growth means more jobs and more new businesses. More jobs give people choices about where to work,” Clinton said. “That’s why economists that getting closer to full employment is crucial for raising incomes.”

How she wants to fix it

-Create for an infrastructure bank that would “finance world-class airports, railways, roads, bridges and ports” across the states.

-Build broadband networks with greater diversity of providers.

-Pass comprehensive immigration reform. Bringing the millions of undocumented immigrants into the legitimate economy, Clinton said, would create $700 billion of growth over 10 years.

-Invest in cleaner renewable energy and fund research and development. “The time has come to make America the world’s clean energy superpower,” Clinton said. “These investments will create millions of jobs.”

-Provide tax relief to small businesses, which Clinton said create 60% of new jobs in this country.

Problem as described by Clinton: Women aren’t participating fully in the economy

Clinton pointed to data showing that in 1990, the United States ranked 7th out of 24 developed countries in women’s labor force participation; by 2013, she said, the U.S. had fallen to 19th. “We cant afford to leave talent on the sidelines,” Clinton said.

How she wants to fix it

Clinton is advocating for fair pay laws, fair scheduling and easily accessible childcare. The lack of paid parental leave makes it inordinately difficult, Clinton said, for women to have a family and a job.

Problem as described by Clinton: The U.S. isn’t focused on long-term growth

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American businesses are too focused on short-term growth, a problem Clinton referred to as “quarterly capitalism.” The economy, Clinton said, should be structured to encourage investment over years and decades.

“I believe part of public service is planting trees under whose shade you’ll never sit,” Clinton said.

How she wants to fix it

-Create a tax credit of $1,500 to businesses for any worker that they train and hire. “Workers are assets. Investing in them pays of,” Clinton said.

-Reform capital gains taxes to encourage long-term investments over high-frequency trading.

Problem as described by Clinton: Wall Street is still engaged in risky business and trading practices

Too many individuals were not held accountable for the excesses of the last decade that led to the recession, Clinton said, and the Dodd-Frank financial reform law did not go far enough.

How she wants to fix it

-Appoint more regulators, prosecute individuals and firms, tighten rules for trading.

“We’ll ensure no firm is too complex to manage or oversee,” Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton Will Pledge Profit-Sharing Incentives to Boost Wages // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton will on Monday pledge to change the tax code to encourage corporate profit-sharing, calling such programs a “win-win” for business and employees.

Profit-sharing “will be good for workers and good for business,” Clinton will say on Monday, according to an advance excerpt provided by her campaign. “Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company’s success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees’ pockets. It’s a win-win.”

Clinton’s plan involves changing the tax code to push businesses to share corporate earnings with their employees, said a Clinton campaign official. She will expand further on the plan at a campaign stop in New Hampshire this week.

The profit-sharing proposal is part of the Democratic frontrunner’s broad vision for the economy that Clinton will be laying out in a speech Monday.

At the New School in New York, Clinton will explain that she envisions an economy that focuses on middle-class income growth over GDP growth for its own sake. The former secretary of state is riding a wave of economic populism, with many progressives discontent with the worsening income inequality in the country.

Many of the proposals Clinton will lay out are intended to boost wages and improve life for working families: paid leave, raising the minimum wage and protecting collective bargaining.

Her profit-sharing plan, the Clinton campaign official said, is a part of that. “Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce,” Clinton will say on Monday.

Shrinking Paychecks: Hillary Clinton Tackles 2016’s Toughest Economic Question // NPR // Danielle Kurtzleben – July 13, 2015

In a Monday speech, Hillary Clinton focused on a trend that millions of Americans know all too intimately: declining incomes.

The Clinton campaign is calling the phenomenon of stagnant wages "the defining economic challenge of our time," and as debates and primaries draw ever closer, it's becoming clear that jump-starting Americans' wages is going to be the defining challenge of the election. Candidates are furiously trying to differentiate themselves on how to deal with unstoppable phenomena.

A Recent, Scary Problem

The median U.S. household earned $51,939 in 2013. That's down by nearly 9 percent from the 1999 peak of nearly $56,900.

This decline in incomes isn't just about the Great Recession. Over a longer time frame, workers' share of the U.S. economic pie has shrunk. This is something economists call the "labor share" or "wage share" of the economy. Consider the following chart, which shows labor's share of economic output over time (the Federal Reserve has indexed the data in such a way that 2009 equals 100, but the point is more the direction than the numbers). That has been declining over the longer term as well.

Knowing what's behind this problem shows just what makes it hard to combat: Some of the biggest factors behind that shrinking labor share are also genies that are hard to put back into the proverbial bottle.

Why Are Workers Losing Money?

There are a lot of explanations for that shrinking labor share of income, but one popular one is that the Great Recession exacerbated longer-term trends that were already at work. That recession hangover still hasn't gone away. Employment is still pretty low right now, and when there's that much slack in the labor market, it's harder for workers to negotiate for higher paychecks. In addition, plenty of workers who are working part time want more hours. The labor market is healing, but there's still enough remaining slack that employers have the leverage.

Still, even once the U.S. is at full employment, longer-term factors could continue to eat away at workers' paychecks. One of the most commonly blamed factors behind the shrinking labor share is technology. Many jobs that can be routinized — scanning groceries and taking money, keeping a schedule and filing away documents, analyzing legal documents — are increasingly done by machines, threatening workers like store clerks, secretaries and paralegals. And while it's true that technology helps create jobs, many of those in the "gig economy" Clinton referenced Monday are low-paid and benefit-free — think Uber drivers and TaskRabbits.

Another factor is globalization. Increasing trade has its benefits and drawbacks — cheaper goods but the loss of some jobs to other countries, for example. A growing financial sector is also considered a potential cause behind the shrinking labor share, as businesses invest in capital instead of labor.

To the extent that these forces are indeed shrinking Americans' incomes, one of the key economic issues to watch in this election, then, will be whether and how candidates deal with these mammoth forces. They're all trends that would be remarkably difficult to roll back: You can't un-integrate an increasingly globalized world, you can't rewind technological progress, and shrinking the U.S. financial system would be, at the very least, a monumental undertaking.

As Clinton herself said of technology and trade, "All of these trends are real, and none, none is going away." Throughout her speech, she framed the challenge as one of dealing with new economic forces that prior presidents (like her husband) never even considered.

Clinton didn't outline specific policies in her speech, though she did advocate for unions, better paid leave policies and tougher regulations on Wall Street, among other things. At the same time, she blasted her Republican opponents' policies that are likewise aimed at helping the American economy: Marco Rubio's tax reform plan, Scott Walker's anti-union policies in Wisconsin and Jeb Bush's recent claim that he wants Americans to work longer hours as part of his bid to grow the economy by 4 percent. (The Bush campaign has said he meant part-time workers should get more hours if they want them.)

"He must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said. "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

Clinton may have come out swinging against her conservative opponents, but she also toed a careful line, stopping short of creeping too far into class warfare territory.

It's true that she blasted Rubio's tax plan as benefiting the wealthy too much, and she also advocated closing tax loopholes that the wealthy take advantage of. But she also made it clear that she still wants the richest Americans, as well as the poorest, to continue prospering.

"The measure of our success must be how much incomes rise for hard-working families, not just for successful CEOs and money managers," she said, adding, "I want to see our economy work for the struggling, the striving, and the successful."

It's that all-encompassing inclusiveness that some on the left have criticized for nearly six months now, since the Center for American Progress released its report on "inclusive prosperity," considered an economic blueprint for a Hillary Clinton administration. Critics like Robert Reich (labor secretary under Bill Clinton) have said the more important (and controversial) issue she needs to tackle is income distribution.

That's one area where Hillary Clinton's rhetoric stands in stark contrast to her most visible Democratic opponent right now, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. While Clinton wants inclusive growth, Sanders says that maybe growth isn't all that important if not everyone shares in it, as the Washington Post's Jim Tankersley writes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One other big area Clinton left out Monday: the Trans-Pacific Partnership, one of the areas where Sanders most often attacks her. The closest she came was a vague call for setting a "high bar" on trade deals. She has been notably quiet on TPP, the massive and controversial trade deal the Obama administration is negotiating right now. Many on the left, including unions, hate the deal, saying it will hurt American workers' paychecks. In a speech about that very topic, it was an important omission, and her supporters and opponents alike will assuredly continue to watch closely to see exactly what she thinks about this hot economic topic.

Hillary Clinton Puts Paycheck Feminism at the Center of Her Economic Agenda // The Nation // Michelle Goldberg – July 13, 2015

illary Clinton's speech today was the most progressive address on economics by a major-party presidential candidate in a generation. It was strongly feminist and pro-union. It called for "enhancing" Social Security and stepping up prosecutions of Wall Street malefactors, and specifically attacked HSBC, the banking giant and Clinton Foundation donor. The speech marks a decisive break from the technocratic triangulation of her husband's administration. As Lawrence Mishel points out at the Economic Policy Institute, it was notable that Clinton didn't propose market-based solutions for wage stagnation, which she defined as the central economic challenge of our time. Rather than offering Third Way panaceas like worker retraining or middle-class tax cuts, she championed strong government intervention on behalf of workers: a higher minimum wage, strengthened collective bargaining, full employment, and cracking down "on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors."

That last bit seems particularly significant for what it says about how much politics has changed since the 1990s. Clinton's words, after all, seem to directly allude to an employment dispute at Uber. As a story about the contingent workforce in today's New York Times begins, "When the California Labor Commissioner's Office ruled last month that an Uber driver was an employee deserving of a variety of workplace protections—and was not, as the company maintained, an independent contractor—it highlighted the divided feelings many Americans have about what is increasingly being called the 'gig economy.'" Whereas Bill Clinton was known for championing Silicon Valley, Hillary Clinton has taken clear aim at the employment model underlying some of its hottest companies.

It's also important that Hillary Clinton has put paycheck feminism at the center of her economic agenda. The speech focused on all that's lost when women are forced out of the workplace by inadequate leave and childcare policies, without any wishy-washy obeisance to the glories of housewifery. "The movement of women into the workforce over the past forty years was responsible for more than three and a half trillion dollars in economic growth," Clinton said. "But that progress has stalled. The United States used to rank 7th out of 24 advanced countries in women's labor force participation. By 2013, we had dropped to 19th. That represents a lot of unused potential for our economy and for American families. Studies show that nearly a third of this decline relative to other countries is because they're expanding family-friendly policies like paid leave and we are not.... It's time to recognize that quality, affordable childcare is not a luxury—it's a growth strategy." Again, we've come a long way from the '90s, when Clinton was excoriated for making it clear that she valued her career over stay-at-home motherhood, and, as penance, had to participate in a bake-off with Barbara Bush.

The obvious progressive rejoinder to this is that Hillary—negotiator of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, onetime member of Walmart's board—is simply saying what she feels she needs to in order to get elected. To which I'd say: exactly! Clinton is a politician who believes in expediency and pragmatism, and she has come to believe that it is expedient and pragmatic to run an explicitly liberal campaign. This is a powerful statement about the evolution of American politics. It's long been a truism that Republicans fear their base, while Democrats hate theirs. That is no longer true; this is a speech meant to appeal to Elizabeth Warren's supporters, not Clinton's Wall Street friends.

But won't Clinton simply do those friends' bidding once in office? Perhaps, but the political-science literature suggests that, contrary to conventional wisdom, politicians actually try to fulfill their campaign pledges. Jonathan Bernstein looked at the scholarship surrounding the issue in a 2012 Washington Monthly piece, discussing a book by Jeff Fishel that analyzed campaigns from John F. Kennedy through Ronald Reagan. "What he found was that presidents invariably attempt to carry out their promises; the main reason some pledges are not redeemed is congressional opposition, not presidential flip-flopping," wrote Bernstein. "Similarly, Gerald Pomper studied party platforms, and discovered that the promises parties made were consistent with their postelection agendas. More recent and smaller-scale papers have confirmed the main point: presidents' agendas are clearly telegraphed in their campaigns."

George H.W.'s Bush's reversal on his "no new taxes" pledge is considered the exception to the rule. More typical is the way he chiseled away at government support for family planning. It almost certainly contradicted his personal beliefs; as a congressman, Bush was so passionate about birth control that he was nicknamed "rubbers," and as US representative to the United Nations, he championed global action on overpopulation. As Reagan's vice president, however, he recognized that fealty to the anti-abortion movement was non-negotiable, and after promising to serve it faithfully in office, he never dared defy it. Politicians have very strong incentives to do what they say they're going to do, whatever their actual ideas.

So pundits may spend a lot of time wondering about Hillary Clinton's authenticity, but if you want to know what her administration would actually attempt, what's in her speeches probably matters more than what's in her secret heart. And so far in this campaign, what's in her speeches sounds pretty good.

Hillary Clinton draws contrast with Republicans as she lays out economic plan // LA Times // Evan Halper and Michael A. Memoli – July 13, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton used an economic policy speech Monday to make an early contrast with her potential Republican opponents, promising to "rely on evidence more than ideology" in an effort to restore financial security for Americans left behind in the recent economic recovery.

Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, said that boosting middle-class wages was the "defining economic issue of our time" and proposed to overhaul the tax code, promote corporate profit-sharing and advance paid family leave to build what she called a "growth and fairness economy."

"I want to see our economy work for the struggling, the striving and the successful," Clinton said in her address at the New School in New York. "We're not going to find all the answers we need today in the playbooks of the past, we can't go back to the old policies that failed us before, nor can we just replay the successes."

Corporate profit-sharing was an example of the "new ideas" Clinton said she'd promote as president, saying it would give workers a stake in the success of their employer as a way to "boost productivity and put money directly in employees' pockets."

The emphasis on profit-sharing comes amid concerns by Clinton and the many economists advising her that too much of the American economy has become focused on fast earnings for those in top income brackets, to the detriment of rank-and-file workers.

Clinton's speech represented the first look at what aides say will be a detailed agenda, to be rolled out in the coming weeks, that seeks to push capital toward more durable growth, creating incentives for investments in infrastructure and research, for example, while closing what her advisors say are tax loopholes that promote excessive risk-taking in the markets.

She also promoted familiar Democratic priorities such as pay equity for women, paid family leave and affordable childcare, something she said was not a "luxury" but a "growth strategy."

Her proposals take aim at a problem vexing economists: how to pull America out of a prolonged period of stagnant middle-class wages, even at a time when productivity is on the rise.

Income disparity has become a central issue in the race for the White House, and Republican candidates have ideas that differ from Clinton's. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is building his economic agenda around a plan to boost growth of the country's gross domestic product to a sustained 4% a year.

Calling inequality a "drag" on the entire economy, Clinton targeted Bush directly for saying last week that Americans needed to "work longer hours" -- a portion of the former Florida governor's discussion of economic solutions that his campaign said critics have taken out of context. Clinton said Bush "must not have met very many American workers," and challenged him to repeat the claim to nurses, teachers and others who she said "do not need a lecture. They need a raise."

Discussing tax reform, Clinton called a plan from Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida that would slash taxes on top incomes a "budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy," the kind of plan that was typical of the "bad economics" Republicans would propose.

And she attacked the newest GOP contender, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, for "stomping on workers' rights" by seeking to undermine the strength of public employee unions.

"I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks," she vowed, saying the decline of unions was responsible for a third of the increase in income inequality. "If we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting union workers."

The attacks on potential general election foes mirrored a recent effort by President Obama to frame the general election debate on the economy on favorable terms for the party. But Clinton also went a step further as she seeks to boost her standing with liberal Democrats animated by the economic fairness debate, promising to go beyond the Dodd-Frank financial reforms to hold Wall Street accountable for abuses that have hurt the working class.

"While institutions have paid large fines and in some cases admitted guilt, too often it has seemed that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences or none at all, even when they have already pocketed the gains," she said. "This is wrong, and on my watch it will change."

Bush's campaign responded that Clinton's speech was just a collection of "antiquated proposals" to "protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity." The campaign of one of Clinton's Democratic challengers, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, argued that she didn't go far enough and cited his specific plans to target Wall Street in particular as an example of the "fearless and progressive new leadership" needed to fix America's problems.

Hillary Clinton to tout profit sharing as a way to reduce income disparity // LA Times // Evan Halper – July 13, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton will make corporate profit sharing a key piece of her economic agenda, proposing changes in the tax code that encourage companies to boost employee compensation when earnings are robust, according to excerpts of a major campaign address she will deliver Monday.

“We need new ideas,” says a section of the text shared by her campaign. “Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce."

Clinton's speech lauds profit sharing that gives workers a stake in the success of their employer as a way to “boost productivity and put money directly in employees' pockets."

The proposal is part of the Democratic presidential hopeful's overall plan to narrow the income gap between the richest Americans and middle- and low-wage earners. Clinton will unveil her plan for addressing it in a speech at

The emphasis on profit sharing comes amid concerns by Clinton and the many economists advising her that too much of the American economy has become focused on fast earnings for those in top income brackets, to the detriment of rank-and-file workers.

Jeb Bush is building his economic agenda around a plan to boost growth of the country's gross domestic product to a sustained 4% a year.

Clinton will argue Monday that growth alone will not solve the problem of an increasing gap in earnings between the richest Americans and everyone else. She will say the economy needs to be restructured to include policies that help distribute more of the nation's wealth to the middle class.

Clinton is also promoting various social programs intended to give the middle class a leg up, including easing the debt burden on college students and requiring employers to offer paid family leave and sick time.

What's Hillary Clinton really trying to do with the economy? // Boston Globe // Evan Horowitz – July 13, 2015

In a major campaign address Monday morning, Hillary Clinton laid out her plans to make the economy more fair, including by raising the minimum wage, creating more affordable child care, and boosting the incomes of "everyday Americans."

Clinton was direct in her critique of Republican rivals, particularly Jeb Bush's controversial comment that Americans need to work more. But she was silent about her closest Democratic rival, Bernie Sanders, whose dogged attacks on the burdens of inequality and the excesses of Wall Street have attracted an unexpectedly large and passionate following.

What did Clinton propose?

Clinton's remarks were fairly wide-ranging, covering everything from early education to Washington budget battles.

At each step, however, she came back to the challenges facing "hard-working Americans" — middle-class families and low-income workers whose wages have been stuck in place for decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton proposed a range of policies to shift the economic landscape and give more power to workers. That includes raising the minimum wage, encouraging companies to share profits with employees, and providing more worker training.

Clinton used an agenda-setting economic speech to cast GOP prescriptions for the economy as relics of the past.

She also emphasized the particular struggles of working women, like unequal pay, poor parental leave policies, and the limited (often expensive) options for high-quality child care.

“Women who want to work,” she said, “should be able to do so without worrying every day about how they’re going to take care of their children or what will happen if a family member gets sick.” (Obviously, these kinds of challenges can affect men too but in the United States women bear the greater burden of family responsibilities.)

How do Clinton’s plans compare to Republican proposals?

With 15 candidates now vying for the Republican nomination, it’s hard to compare Clinton’s proposals with everything out there. But she did speak directly about Jeb Bush’s call for 4 percent growth, as well as his comments last week that to achieve such growth Americans would have to work more.

“You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. Well, he must not have met very many American workers.”

Yet, despite the jab, Clinton is also calling for Americans to work more. For instance, during her speech she lamented that too many women were leaving the workforce — and she and offered several strategies to bring them back. Separately, she talked about the number of young African-Americans and Latinos cut off from work, and suggested that getting them into jobs would put them on a path to the middle class.

How do Clinton’s proposals compare to Bernie Sanders?

On the Democratic side, Clinton’s closest challenger is Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who has managed to attract a large, progressive following and whose poll numbers have been slowly ticking up.

On most every issue, Sanders is more truculent and more worker-friendly than Clinton. He doesn’t just call for an increase in the minimum wage but for a real living wage. And where Clinton talks about how to get companies to share their profits with workers, Sanders celebrates worker co-ops, where workers actually own more businesses.

Even if she can’t outflank Sanders, Clinton’s remarks did seem designed to peel off some support. She spent a fair bit of time castigating Wall Street for its obsession with short-term gains as well as some of the execrable scandals of recent years.

What she didn’t do was lay out a plan to address these problems — unlike Sanders, who wants to break up the big financial institutions. But perhaps Clinton is merely hoping to convince anti-Wall Street voters that she shares their concerns and that the issue is at least on her radar.

How important is this speech?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's hardly a make-or-break moment in the 2016 presidential campaign, but here's one reason to take note of what Hillary Clinton said this morning: Someday in the future, she may change her mind.

As the campaign goes on, the pool of opponents will shrink, the economy will continue to change, and Clinton herself will face new challenges. Any of those things could cause her to rethink her positions. And it's important to know when and how candidates shift.

After all, being president isn't just about what you believe, it's also about how you respond to an ever-changing world.

Hillary Clinton Attacks Scott Walker, Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio in Economic Policy Speech // ABC // Liz Kreutz – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton wants you to know her economic policy will be nothing like those proposed by the GOP.

While delivering her first major economic policy speech of her campaign, Clinton today called out Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Scott Walker by name to contrast her policies -- focused on strengthening the middle class and increasing wages -- against those of her front-running Republican rivals.

In her remarks, delivered at the New School in downtown Manhattan, Clinton first took aim at former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for his recent comment that "people need to work longer hours." (A remark Bush's campaign said was about unemployment.)

"You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. Well, he must not have met very many American workers," the democratic presidential candidate said.

Clinton then went after Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, calling his tax reform plan a "sure budget busting giveaway for the super wealthy."

And lastly, Clinton went after Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker -- who just entered the presidential race today -- for his "mean-spirited, misguided attacks" against workers.

"Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names by stomping on workers' rights," she said.

Overall, Clinton attacked the trickle-down economics proposed by past Republican presidents -- saying that "twice now" a Democratic president (President Clinton and President Obama) "has had to come in and clean up the mess left behind" -- and proposed her own, new plan aimed at both "growth and fairness."

Clinton said her priority will be to boost middle-class wages, which she said is the "defining economic challenge of our time."

In her remarks, Clinton laid out a series of proposals -- including tax cuts for businesses and increasing the minimum wage -- for how she plans to do it.

Here's a list of what she proposed:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Increasing the minimum wage
- Policies such as affordable child care and paid leave, focused on getting more women get into the work force
- Tax cuts for small businesses
- Tax reforms so that the wealthy “have to pay their fair share.”
- Support for union workers and ending efforts to undermine worker bargaining power
- Incentives for businesses to expand profit-sharing with employees
- Education reform, including ways to improve schools, make college affordable and help Americans refinance their student debt
- Comprehensive immigration reform (which Clinton called “another engine of strong growth”)
- Investments in infrastructure, clean-energy programs, scientific and medical research, and net businesses investments like factories, machines and research labs
- Capital gains tax reform to reward “longer term investments that create jobs, not just quick trades”
- Wall Street reform and protection of “Dodd-Frank” laws

Notably, Clinton did not go into many specifics -- she did not specify by how much she wants to raise the minimum wage, nor did she say what her tax reform would entail. But her campaign says this speech simply laid out the foundation of her plan –- and the overarching themes -- and that she will roll out the details of the proposals in the coming weeks.

Towards the end of Clinton's remarks, a heckler called out over the crowd, "Will you restore Glass-Steagall?" -- referring to the 1933 legislation that limited the affiliation between banks and securities firms, and provisions of which were repealed in 1999. Some critics have pointed to the repeal as one of the contributing factors to the 2008 financial crisis.

Clinton did not respond and the man -- who said he was frustrated Clinton did not take any questions -- was quickly escorted out by security.

Hillary Clinton Pitches Plan for 'Growth and Fairness Economy' // NBC News // Carrie Dann – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton offered her vision Monday of a "growth and fairness economy," saying that her agenda would boost Americans' incomes and push companies to share profits with their employees.

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy. You can't have one without the other," she said during remarks at the New School in New York City.

The 2016 Democratic candidate said that incomes have stalled even as corporate profits have skyrocketed, creating inequality that is "a drag on our entire economy."

"Wages need to rise to keep up with costs," she said. "Paychecks need to grow. Families who work hard and do their part deserve to get ahead and stay ahead."

She took an explicit shot at Republican rival Jeb Bush, directly referencing his statement last week that Americans "need to work longer hours."

"Well, he must not have met very many American workers," she said. Referencing nurses and fast food workers with grueling schedules, she added: "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

She also mentioned by name Republican candidates Sen. Marco Rubio, whose tax plan she derided as a "budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy," and Gov. Scott Walker, whose fights against labor unions in Wisconsin she branded as "mean-spirited and misguided attacks." Walker is slated to formally announce his run later Monday in Wisconsin.

During her remarks, Clinton also called for companies to expand profit-sharing with their employees, pledging to change the tax code to incentivize such moves.

"Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets. It's a win-win," she said.

And she promised to "break down barriers to joining the workforce - especially for women."

The Democratic frontrunner did not explicitly mention progressive rivals like Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who has won accolades from the party's left wing for his criticisms of Wall Street and big banks.

But she vowed to go beyond the Obama-backed Dodd-Frank banking reforms to "rein in excessive risk on Wall Street," and she called for prosecution of "criminal behavior" of culpable individuals in the banking industry.

In economic address, Hillary Clinton calls out 'gig' economy // CNBC // Kate Rogers – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton laid out her economic agenda in New York City on Monday. She focused on ways to lift American workers and called out the sharing economy as a potential factor in dampened wage growth.

The sharing economy—bolstered by high-flying start-ups including Uber, Airbnb and Lyft—allows individuals to share products and services like offering homes and apartments for rent, or driving passengers to destinations. The small tasks often are brokered through mobile smartphone apps, and the platforms connect freelancers with available short-term gigs.

Amid an uneven economic recovery, many American workers are cobbling together a patchwork of jobs. But freelance freedom and flexibility don't come with traditional full-time benefits including health care or retirement savings.

More lower-paying jobs since recession

"Many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing a website ... even driving their own car. This on demand or so called 'gig' economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future," Clinton said.

She laid out her economic plan during an address at The New School in Manhattan.

An estimated 53 million Americans—more than 1 in 3 workers—are freelancers, according to a 2014 report by independent research firm Edelman Berland. The study was commissioned by the Freelancers Union in partnership with Elance-oDesk.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Separate data show recent lower-wage job gains outpacing higher-wage job growth, according to the National Employment Law Project.

There are now 1.2 million fewer jobs in mid- and higher-wage industries than there were prior to the Great Recession, according to NELP data. In contrast, there are 2.3 million more jobs in lower-wage sectors than before the recession.

Rise of the Uber driver

While older workers are participating in the sharing economy, the young, tech freelancer is likely to become an important symbol during the presidential election campaign.

"In 2008, it was all about 'Joe the Plumber.' In 2016, it will likely be 'Carl the Uber driver,'" said Jeremiah Owyang, analyst and founder of Silicon Valley-based Crowd Companies, which focuses on the collaborative economy.

Some workers are suing start-ups including Uber and Lyft to be classified as employees, not independent contractors.

Clinton also vowed to ensure workers are being properly paid and protected. "I'll crack down on bosses that exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages," she told the crowd.

But others argue the "gig" economy offers workers an incredible amount of flexibility.

If the jobs "meet people's needs for flexible employment and provide learning real skills and pay decent wages, then they are certainly a positive for the economy," said Paul Osterman, professor at the MIT Sloan School. If the freelance jobs "result from misclassification to avoid paying benefits or employment taxes, then they are an emerging problem and a source of worsening job quality," Osterman said in an email to CNBC.

Hillary Clinton shows she's really a liberal on economics // Vox // Jonathan Allen – July 13, 2015

If there's one thing that frustrates liberal Democrats the most about Hillary Clinton's politics, it's that she doesn't seem to share — or maybe even get — the base's gut instincts. She's bad at explaining her motivations in a way that connects with core Democrats.

But as she laid out her economic vision in a Monday speech that rejected Republican theories without embracing hard-left policies, Clinton did something that's been difficult for her in the past: She spoke to both the head and the heart of the Democratic Party.

Clinton promised to prosecute financial fraudsters, defend and expand the Affordable Care Act, and "fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks" on unions.

More broadly, Clinton succeeded in articulating a vision for reshaping the American economy to promote growth by directing help to working- and middle-class families. In classic Clintonian fashion, she drew her sharpest contrasts with Republicans — calling out Jeb Bush, Scott Walker, and Marco Rubio by name — while glossing over some of the differences on the Democratic side of the national policy debate.

"It was both an intellectual and emotional appeal," said Jared Bernstein, a liberal economist who served as an adviser to Vice President Joe Biden. He praised her, in particular, for a comprehensive connection of policies affecting middle-class Americans to economic growth, from collective bargaining to profit sharing. "She covered every corner of the debate."

She didn't read a white paper on tax reform. How do I know whether she's really liberal?

Clinton stayed at the 30,000-foot level for most of the speech, declining to get into the nitty-gritty of how she would use executive power — or work with Republicans in Congress — to implement her agenda.

What Clinton did articulate, though, is the set of fundamental concepts guiding her campaign's economic agenda. Taken as a whole, that vision is clearly left of center. Some of what she laid out sounded pretty progressive — for example, creating incentives for companies to share profits with their employees, increasing regulation of the financial industry, and prosecuting the financial crimes of individuals at big institutions. (Liberals have criticized President Obama and former Attorney General Eric Holder for failing to win convictions on Wall Street and for selling low in settlements with banks).

The broad strokes often aren't enough for many liberals. They worry that if not nailed down, she'll eventually tack toward a "third way" like President Bill Clinton. They want to be convinced that she's motivated by the same instincts they are, and they want to know that the set of advisers around her won't pull her in another direction.

Clinton's campaign released a set of advisers on the speech that includes liberal economists Joseph Stiglitz and Alan Blinder, as well as Neera Tanden, a former Clinton aide who is the head of the liberal think tank Center for American Progress.

In its construction — in terms of both language and who played a hand in writing it — Clinton's speech on Monday should have gone a long way toward assuaging those concerns. It's not that she's ready to adopt Bernie Sanders's platform. She'll never do that because she's simply not that far left. But she's starting to talk about the theory behind her policy, and it should comfort liberals because it matches up well with their heads and hearts.

Clinton's big move: explaining her motivations

The most important thing Clinton did Monday is explain why she wants to target government benefits to working- and middle-class Americans.

"The defining economic challenge of our time is clear," she said. "We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so they can afford a middle-class life. We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country."

There's no more core progressive belief than the idea that boosting the lower and middle classes is how you spur sustainable economic growth.

And there are two reasons to think she would follow through on her plans. First, we know presidents try to fulfill their campaign promises. Second, Clinton has developed a policy process for her campaign that resembles that of the White House, with Jake Sullivan, the former deputy chief of staff at the State Department, playing the coordinating role. The vision and big decisions are made at the top, but the constituent parts are put together through the input of inside and outside advisers. That is, there are a lot of fingerprints on the plan and a lot of stakeholders to be kept on board.

Clinton won praise from Stiglitz, a Nobel laureate and chief economist at the Roosevelt Institute, who was one of the scores of advisers who helped build the foundation for the speech.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Growth is not achieved by pulling a number out of thin air but by focusing on and investing in our families and communities, ensuring Americans can earn enough to afford a middle-class life, and making our financial markets work for everyday Americans rather than the short-term interests of CEOs and speculators," Stiglitz said. "Today Hillary Clinton began to offer the kind of comprehensive approach we need to tackle the enormous economic challenges we face, one that is squarely in line with what we have called for at the Roosevelt Institute."

That's not to say Clinton went far enough to win ringing endorsements from everyone on the left — or on all of topics she raised.

Clinton talked about trade, but refused to pick a spot on the Democratic spectrum.

"We do need to set a high bar for trade agreements," she said, evading the question of whether she will back the controversial Trans-Pacific Partnership pact. "We should support them if they create jobs, raise wages, and advance our national security. And we should be prepared to walk away if they don't."

Ultimately, it will matter less where Clinton would be rated on a progressive's scorecard than whether she can convince liberals that they should be excited — or at least comfortable — with where she wants to take the country and why.

The other key to the speech was her contrast with Republicans

Politicians like to say that elections are about choices. On Monday, Clinton framed her vision as the antithesis of Republican economic theory. She ripped Bush for saying American workers should work "longer hours" — though he may have meant moving from part-time to full-time employment — upbraided Rubio for a tax plan that would help millionaires, and said union-busting efforts by Gov. Scott Walker and other Republicans are "mean-spirited" and "misguided."

More important than the individual digs, which served to illustrate her larger point, was Clinton's basic attack on GOP economics.

"For 35 years, Republicans have argued that if we give more wealth to those at the top — by cutting their taxes and letting big corporations write their own rules — it will trickle down, it will trickle down to everyone else," Clinton said. "Yet every time they have a chance to try that approach, it explodes the national debt, concentrates wealth even more, and does practically nothing to help hard-working Americans."

Even in reaching out to progressives, Clinton all but said any flavor of Democrat is better than a Republican.

"Twice now in the past 20 years, a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess," she said. "I think the results speak for themselves.tec

Hillary Clinton just embraced one of Elizabeth Warren's main criticisms of Obama // Vox // Matthew Yglesias – July 13, 2015

If she becomes president, Hillary Clinton will confront the challenge that Republicans will almost certainly still control Congress. In practice, this means her scope for dramatic new policy achievements is likely to be limited. And it's why the remarks she made Monday morning on prosecuting financial crime are some of the most important words she's spoken thus far in the campaign.

Appointing prosecutors and regulators with a mandate to be tougher than those the Obama administration has put in office is something that she can actually do.

This speaks to one of liberals' biggest complaints with Eric Holder and the Obama Justice Department — an endless parade of fines with no serious consequences for individual wrongdoing. Elizabeth Warren, among others, has been banging this drum for years without securing any real change in the administration's approach:

"I would have thought that given the things the Department of Justice has been saying about how aggressive they want to get about corporate crime — I would expect to see more corporations prosecuted," Brandon L. Garrett, professor at University of Virginia Law School and author of Too Big To Jail, told Vox last November. "Instead, those numbers have been declining. And I would expect to see more individuals prosecuted in these cases, and very few individuals are prosecuted."

There are significant structural barriers to successful high-level white-collar criminal prosecutions, but whether to at least try is more or less up to the discretion of any given administration.

If a hypothetical future Clinton administration wants to go after more individuals when regulators catch banks breaking the rules, congressional Republicans can't really stop them. At the same time, in the universe of possible ways to get to Obama's left this seems like a pretty safe bet. Wall Street banks are happy to complain about excessive red tape, but no CEO is going to stand up and publicly say that he should be immune from prosecution if his bank is caught laundering money.

Meanwhile, to bank foes the question will be whether Clinton means it. Similar promises to get tough have been made before, only to leave reformers feeling burned by a lack of follow-up, with Obama's second SEC Chair Mary Jo White only the most recent example. Clinton doesn't bear any responsibility for the Obama administration's tendency to go back and forth on the desired severity of enforcement actions, but to activists focused on the issue there is a trust gap. But skeptics should take some succor from the fact that Clinton's practical scope for accomplishment is likely to be sharply constrained. The stakes in 2016 are high, but realistically Clinton is going to want to be remembered as something more than a conservator of the Obama agenda. Demanding tough prosecutions of financial malefactors is a way of leaving a mark that Clinton can actually deliver on.

Hillary Clinton to Jeb Bush: American workers "don't need a lecture, they need a raise" // Vox // Jonathan Allen – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton ripped into top-tier Republican rivals Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker — but not the insurgent Donald Trump — in the midst of an economic policy speech Monday.

On Jeb Bush and whether workers need to work longer hours

Clinton's first name-check was Bush. Last week, Bush said that Americans "need to work longer hours" to boost the economy. That brought full gaffe condemnation from Democrats — and some pundits — leaving Bush defenders to assert that he meant it in the context of part-time laborers having more full-time employment opportunities. Clinton wasn't buying any of it.

"He must not have met very many American workers," she said. "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

On Marco Rubio's tax cuts for the rich

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Tax Policy Center analysis of a version of Rubio's tax plan found that there would be minimal benefit to low-income families, while those making $3.3 million or more would see an average tax cut of about $240,000. Clinton urged listeners to "take a good look" at GOP tax plans, starting with Rubio's.

"That's a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy," she said.

On Scott Walker's crusade against unions

Clinton saved her harshest line of attack for the newest official candidate, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who rose to national prominence by busting unions in his home state.

"Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on workers' rights," Clinton said. "I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

The one she left alone: Donald Trump

Clinton drew an implicit contrast with Donald Trump, who has surged into a virtual tie with Bush atop the Republican field by whipping up fervor against unauthorized immigrants. "I know it's not always how we think about this, but another engine of strong growth should be comprehensive immigration reform," she said.

But she didn't go after The Donald by name. That's probably because his rise is exposing rifts within the Republican Party. One iron law of politics: Don't get in the way when the other party is imploding.

Update: Allie Brandenburger, a spokesperson for Bush, sent in her response to Clinton's speech.

"Hillary Clinton is proposing the same failed policies we have seen in the Obama economy, where the typical American household's income has declined and it's harder for businesses to hire and the middle class to achieve rising incomes.

"Americans want to work and want the opportunity to achieve earned success for their families, but Secretary Clinton's antiquated proposals protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity and 21st Century companies like Uber that are creating jobs. Governor Bush believes harnessing innovation and fostering technology can help us grow at 4 percent once again."

Hillary Clinton's new paleo-liberalism // VOX // Matthew Yglesia – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton's record in office suggests that she is more liberal than either her husband or Barack Obama, and in a Monday speech outlining her economic vision she is set to confirm that.

Background briefing documents provided by her campaign to journalists in advance of the speech suggest she's making an effort to avoid a hard break with the previous two Democratic presidents, pointing out instead that times have changed since 1992 or since the circumstances of the 2008 economic crisis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the documents nonetheless hint at a fundamental philosophical difference: Clinton is less inclined to favor a market-oriented approach than a left-wing approach, a real change from the past quarter century of Democratic Party economic policymaking.

What we won't get on Monday is much policy detail to flesh out how this difference might look in practice. And many left-wing interest group leaders and intellectuals to whom this new way of thinking has been previewed have expressed skepticism to me about its sincerity. But history suggests that presidents generally try to implement the agenda they have promised, so it's worth paying attention.

The great divide in left-of-center economics

The biggest divide in American economic policy is, of course, the one that separates the Republican approach from the Democratic one. But within the left-of-center camp there is a long-running conceptual dispute between what you might call neoliberalism and paleo-liberalism.

The keys to the neoliberal approach that dominated both the Clinton and Obama administrations are, roughly:

The main way the government can impact the pre-tax distribution of income is by providing high-quality education to as many people as possible.

Financial markets should be regulated to guard against catastrophe, but also should take a leading role in driving investment decisions across the private sector.

To the extent that the education path fails to generate a satisfactory distribution of economic resources, progressive taxes should fund redistributive programs to produce a better outcome.

The paleo-liberal approach denies most of this, harkening back to an era in which government regulation and labor unions played a more direct role in compressing the pre-tax distribution of labor income and the financial sector was deliberately regulated in a heavy-handed way rather than allowed to lead the economy.

Neither Clinton nor Obama ever adhered purely to the neoliberal philosophy (both endorsed minimum wage hikes, for example, and saw a large constructive role for the government in guiding the health care sector) but it has been a dominant strand in both administrations' thinking.

The new paleo-liberalism

The philosophy Clinton will outline is essentially a modern-day revival of the old paleoliberal side of this fight. The ideas and people referenced on background clearly reflect the influence of a new set of institutions that have arisen in the 21st century that all aim to push against the hegemony of neoliberal ideas. Key focus points for this paleoliberal revival include the Washington Center on Equitable Growth that Clinton's campaign chair John Podesta founded in 2013 (and where, full disclosure, my wife used to work), the Roosevelt Institute, and George Soros's Institute for New Economic Thinking.

These groups promote concepts that we can expect to see Clinton embrace but that reverse the neoliberal formula of her husband's administration:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The government should take an active role in writing economic rules that promote high wages, rather than relying on taxes and transfer payments.

Financial markets do a poor job of guiding private sector investment (she will frame this as a critique of short-term thinking).

Increasing educational attainment is an inadequate strategy for curbing inequality.

Clinton intends to bring this all together under the idea that high levels of inequality reduce the rate of economic growth rather than being an inevitable result of growth-friendly policies, technology, and globalization.

Conceptually, this sets Clinton up for a much more vigorous regulatory approach than either the Obama or (especially) Clinton administrations took. One that is much less worried that rules that reduce business profits will also reduce investment and growth, and one that is much friendlier to the idea that strong labor unions are not only compatible with but arguably necessary for rapid economic growth.

What does it mean?

Politics is more about concrete policy choices than abstract philosophy, and thus far we've seen relatively little indication of how Clinton would deliver on these ideas in a concrete way that differs from her predecessors.

Joining the Congressional Democratic backlash against the Trans-Pacific Partnership would have been one way to do that, but it's a step she rather pointedly declined to take. Nor has she embraced liberals' call to expand Social Security and she's been somewhat cagey about whether or not she endorses the movement for a $15-an-hour minimum wage. She certainly hasn't joined Elizabeth Warren, Bernie Sanders, and Martin O'Malley in calling for a break up of Wall Street's biggest banks.

Many veterans of the intra-Democratic clash on economic policy doubt the sincerity of Clinton's moves to join their camp. Ironically, the fact that leading neoliberals like Larry Summers are now singing from a more paleo-liberal songbook gives the old-time paleoliberals heartburn. They see a ploy by their old rivals to bend with the wind rather than breaking so as to retain control over the highest levels of the Democratic Party. Clinton's team is explicitly intending to stay abstract initially. Rather than a laundry-list of policy initiatives, they want to paint a broad vision that they then fill out over time. Only when that happens will we really get a sense of how much Clinton intends a break with the past.

Hillary Clinton squarely took aim at her biggest rivals on Monday during the first policy speech of her campaign, directly calling them by name as she strives to get Democrats fired up about her candidacy.

The names she uttered spoke volumes: Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Scott Walker.

For all the talk about the need to protect her left flank, she treated the spark of Bernie Sanders like little more than a summer firefly that can be ignored or swatted away.

In her second bid for the presidency, Clinton may not be inspiring the passion of the crowds turning out for Sanders. But she made clear on Monday that she believes the best way to rally Democrats to her side in the primary fight is to present herself as the toughest, most electable candidate for the general election, casting back to her husband's economy in order to project forward to her own.

"Under President Clinton," she said, referring to him. "I like the sound of that," she added, smiling at the thought of being in the White House again.

The confidence of her words illustrates that she is comfortable playing the long game and has no intention of being spooked or distracted by any Democratic who are slow to jump on the bandwagon.

Whether it's a risky strategy to underestimate her Democratic opponents won't be known until the winter, when she faces the voters of Iowa and New Hampshire. But for now, at least, Clinton is looking far beyond those early contests to a bigger fight.

Framing 2016 as Democrat vs. Republican

She accused Bush, the former Florida governor, of being out of touch with American workers. She sought to use his own words against him when he said last week in New Hampshire that "people need to work longer hours."

"Well, he must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said. "They don't need a lecture -- they need a raise."

Before she even finished her speech at the New School in Manhattan, Bush had already opened a fundraising drive with her remarks. His aides said she was distorting his words, when he was simply saying there were not enough full-time job opportunities for workers.

While Clinton's policy address was substantive, it was also heavily laced with familiar economic arguments that have framed the Democratic vs. Republican fight for years. She hedged her bets, clearly not sure which Republican candidate would emerge from their crowded primary fight.

She blasted a tax proposal from Rubio, the Florida senator, and said it would cut taxes for families making $3 million a year.

"Well that's a sure budget-busting give-away to the super-wealthy," Clinton said. "And that's the kind of bad economics you're likely to get from any of the candidates on the other side."

And she assailed Walker as "mean-spirited" and "misguided" for his successful effort to curtain unions' rights in Wisconsin, rushing to the defense of Democrats' labor base -- tying its decline to growing inequality, particularly among men.

"Republicans' governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on workers' rights," Clinton said. "And practically all the Republican candidates hope to do the same as President."

A new look at policy proposals

The Clinton speech, which came nearly three months to the day since she declared her candidacy, offered one of the most expansive looks yet at her policy proposals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was hardly a fiery stemwinder, but her 45-minute address laid the groundwork for themes she will turn back to again and again in her campaign as she tries to present herself as a fighter for the middle class. It also served as a benchmark for whether she can get through her primary fight without directly drawing distinctions with her Democratic rivals, namely Sanders, who has been strongly embraced by the progressive movement.

Clinton was dodging the left, offering up what liberals have ached to hear from a presidential candidate without delving into details or making firm commitments, while she jabbed the right.

She offered scolding words for Wall Street, saying she would criminally prosecute financial firms and individuals for any wrongdoing.

The comment struck liberal groups -- particularly several that had tried to recruit firebrand Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the race -- because it's further than President Barack Obama's administration was willing to go in the wake of the 2008 economic downturn.

Joseph Stiglitz, the Nobel Prize-winning economist who is a darling of the left and has met with Clinton to talk policy, said her speech shows she understands the need to "fundamentally rewrite the rules" to ensure that "our financial markets work for everyday Americans rather than the short-term interests of CEOs and speculators."

Clinton didn't offer the harsh attacks on corporate America that Sanders has served up for the left, but she did condemn Republicans for claiming they could achieve substantial economic growth rates without also offering policies that would direct that new income toward the middle class.

"Today, as the shadow of crisis recedes and longer-term challenges come into focus, I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," Clinton said. "You can't have one without the other."

As she stood on a stage, flanked by a row of flags, Clinton sent a signal that she would rely on her experience -- and that of the last two Democratic presidential administrations -- but that she would also have to charter her own forward-looking course.

"We're not going to find all the answers we need today in the playbooks of the past," Clinton said. "Today is not 1993 or 2009. We need solutions for the big challenges we face now."

Hillary Clinton's economic pitch: Americans 'need a raise' // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to rein in out-of-control financial institutions on Monday as she detailed an economic vision that she said would achieve the "defining economic challenge of our life" of lifting middle-class wages.

The Democratic front-runner lambasted a marketplace she said is too obsessed with second-to-second stock trading and quarterly earnings reports, at the expense of long-term growth and stability.

Clinton even took a veiled shot at President Barack Obama's administration for failing to prosecute individuals for banking crimes in the wake of the 2008 economic downturn.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She accused hedge funds and high-frequency traders of "criminal behavior," and promised to "prosecute individuals as well as firms" when they break the law -- which liberals have long clamored for, but the Obama administration largely didn't do. She also said she'd seek to expand on the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulatory law designed to prevent future economic crises.

"'Too big to fail' is still too big a problem," Clinton said.

Held at The New School, a university in lower Manhattan, the event was billed as Clinton's first major economic policy speech. She touched a long list of items she'll expound on in additional events over the summer, and included several sections -- including the attack on Wall Street -- that could help blunt the progressive dissatisfaction demonstrated in Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders' rapid rise up the Democratic primary polls.

But Clinton didn't mention Sanders at all -- and instead, she went after her potential Republican rivals.

She laced the speech with assaults on three leading GOP presidential candidates: Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for his comment that some Americans should work more hours; Florida Sen. Marco Rubio for a tax plan she said would benefit only the wealthy; and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker for battling with labor unions.

Those attacks signaled that Clinton believes her way to winning the Democratic nomination is by proving she's best able to take on Bush and other top Republicans in a general election, rather than locking horns with primary challengers.

"For 35 years, Republicans have argued that if we give more wealth to those at the top by cutting their taxes and letting big corporations write their own rules, it will trickle down -- it will trickle down to everyone else," Clinton said.

Her attack on Bush was the sharpest. Clinton pointed to his comment that some Americans who work in a part-time economy need to take on more hours and said: "They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

She said two Democratic presidents before -- Obama and Bill Clinton -- have been charged with rescuing an economy that GOP presidents left in shambles.

She praised Obama for bailing out the automotive industry and expanding access to health insurance. And she joked about her husband's title, while lauding his record.

"Under President Clinton -- I like the sound of that -- America saw the longest peace-time expansion in our history," Clinton said. "Nearly 23 million jobs, a balanced budget and a surplus for the future. And most importantly, incomes rose across the board, not just for those already at the top."

Clinton's speech was the product of more than 200 meetings between her policy team and a roster of outside advisers that includes economists like Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz. Clinton took many of the meetings herself, aides said.

Drawing on decades of research, Clinton said the evolution of the "gig economy" -- represented by companies like the ride-sharing Uber and housing renter Airbnb, which she made opaque references to without mentioning by name -- and said it has undercut the stability and security that jobs have traditionally offered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said she favors tax reforms that would give companies incentives to share their profits with employees. She pitched an American infrastructure bank, as well as a renewed focus on clean energy and tax relief for small businesses. And she previewed her upcoming policy pitches on child care, paid sick leave and paid family leave.

"Many of these proposals are time-tested and more than a little battle-scarred," she said.

Clinton is attemping to counter what she sees as a conservative-driven narrative in American politics that intervening in the economy on behalf of the middle class stymies job growth.

"That's really not what the weight of economic evidence shows," said Heather Boushey, who has consulted with Clinton's campaign and is the executive director and chief economist at the Washington Center for Equitable Growth. "You can't accept a trade-off anymore that doesn't seem to hold water."

Boushey said Clinton is "laying out an agenda that looks at what inequality means for families up and down the income distribution, what we can do to fix it, and it's really exciting to see a politician take up a very serious set of research ideas and bring them into the public debate."

Her policy team is headed by Jake Sullivan, a former top aide to Clinton at the State Department and U.S. negotiator in the Iran nuclear talks, as well as Ann O'Leary and Maya Harris, who both worked at the left-leaning Center for American Progress.

Outside advisers have included a host of liberal economists, former government officials and more. Among them are the Noble Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz, top Obama economic policy aides Gene Sperling, Christina Romer, David Kamin and Alan Krueger.

Neera Tanden, a top 2008 Clinton campaign aide and now president of the Center for American Progress, was among the outside advisers, as were former Bill Clinton economist Alan Blinder, and economists Jacob Hacker, Ronnie Chatterji and Boushey.

Clinton to urge firms to expand profit-sharing with workers, in economic address // Fox – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, in what is billed as a major economic address, plans Monday to urge companies to expand profit-sharing with employees as part of an agenda aimed at boosting middle-class wages.

Clinton is laying out her economic plans after weeks of staying coy on the subject. Though it's unclear whether she'll call for tax increases, a Clinton campaign official said she will urge companies to expand profit-sharing of corporate earnings, pledging changes in the tax code to encourage this. She describes the idea as a "win-win."

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," Clinton said in prepared remarks. "... That will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets."

In laying out an economic agenda focused on middle-class earnings, Clinton may also be seeking to recapture the populist energy in the Democratic electorate, which lately has been gravitating toward Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, right now Clinton's biggest challenger.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton declined in a CNN interview earlier this week to say whether she would raise taxes on big corporations or the country's highest wage-earners, as Sanders has proposed.

"I think we have to grow the economy faster and fairer," she said. "So we have to do what will actually work in the short term, the medium term and the long term. ... then, I'll look forward to the debate."

While top-tier Republican candidate and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has called for an annual growth rate of 4 percent, Clinton will assert that the nation's economy should not be judged by a specific growth figure but rather by how much income increases for middle-class households.

"For a typical working American, their income has not been rising anywhere near as fast as it should be rising, and that is the challenge we face," said David Kamin, a New York University law professor who has advised Clinton's campaign. "It's not a new problem, and it's going to take a holistic vision."

The Clinton campaign said the former first lady and New York senator in her speech at The New School, a university in New York City, will point to economic progress during her husband's two terms in the 1990s and more recently under President Obama.

But she will aim to identify ways of improving upon the uneven nature of the nation's recovery since the Great Recession, bolstering wages even as the unemployment rate has fallen to a seven-year low of 5.3 percent.

Clinton is also expected to begin outlining a series of specific economic proposals this summer on issues like wage growth, college affordability, corporate accountability and paid leave.

In Clinton's approach to the economy, more Americans would share in the prosperity and avoid the boom-and-bust cycles of Wall Street that have led to economic turbulence of the past decade.

Clinton, who is seeking to become the nation's first female president, is also expected to address ways of making it easier for women to join the workforce.

Clinton will attempt to meet the demands of liberals within her own party who are wary of her willingness to regulate Wall Street while inspiring confidence among a larger electorate who will judge her policies if she wins the Democratic nomination.

Hillary Clinton's 'new' economic agenda shouldn't fool anyone. It's just recycled rhetoric that hasn't worked // Fox // Stephen Moore – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton will attempt to reinvent herself for the umpteenth time on Monday when she releases her "new" economic agenda for the working class. Except that from what the Clinton team released over the weekend this is not much more than the leftovers from Obamanomics -- and that hasn't worked out so well for middle America.

Let's see: she wants more infrastructure spending, higher taxes on the foreign earnings of U.S. Corporations and hedge fund managers, a higher minimum wage, new rules to make it easier to form unions (card check), more child care subsidies, expanded paid medical leave for workers, and renewable energy subsidies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sound familiar? It's more taxes, more regulatory burdens on employers, the green agenda, more government spending paid for with debt. One looks at the list of leftist wish list priorities from yesteryear and wonders: Hillary, is this thin grool really all you got?

There aren't even hints of her husband's New Democrat agenda that generated growth and reform of government. The free trade, welfare reform, balanced budget, middle class tax cuts, sound money New Democrat agenda has vanished.

Sadly, Ms. Clinton is slamming the door on the successful centrist agenda of her husband and perhaps for good. Why? Because her political challenger Vermont Independent Senator Bernie Sanders, an avowed socialist, is pulling Hillary and the party in her direction. What's next from Hillary, a call for 70 percent tax rates?

Here's Hillary's unavoidable dilemma: her theme is to advance economic policies that benefit "everyday Americans." But the leftist Obamanomics 2.0 agenda she will announce Monday has been tried for six and a half years now. She says the key to economic progress is not the 4 percent growth that Jeb Bush and other Republicans are pushing, but middle class raises. But under Obama the middle class has gotten pummeled. Middle class household incomes are lower today adjusted for inflation than when the recovery started. Inequality has risen, not fallen under these redistribution policies.

Meanwhile, every poll shows the middle class is angry and anxious about the pint-sized economic recovery and the prospects for achieving the American Dream for their children. Hillary's betting that she can win on an agenda of more of the same when the nation is hungry for a new direction.

Pitifully, Hillary won't -- or politically can't -- advance a genuine agenda of new ideas inside today's demented Democratic party dominated by the progressive left. They won't let her move in a centrist direction. So much for hope and change.

So with Hillary's cupboard is bare when it comes to fixing the economy, Republicans need to respond to the let's vast policy wasteland with a robust platform of reforms to government -- health care, taxes, entitlements, the regulatory state, the IRS, 21st century America-first energy, and a war against waste and Washington incompetence. If they do, they have a good shot of winning back the White House in 2016.

Hillary Clinton unveils her vision for the economy // CBS // Rebecca Kaplan and Steve Chaggaris – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled her vision for the economy Monday, placing her focus squarely on boosting the middle class through a three-part plan to create jobs, reduce income inequality and hold financial institutions more accountable.

"Previous generations of Americans built the greatest economy and strongest middle class the world has ever known on the promise of a basic bargain: if you work hard and do your part, you should be able to get ahead," she said in a speech at the New School, a progressive university in New York City. "But over the past several decades, that bargain has eroded. Our job is to make it strong again."

Clinton, in the first major economic policy speech of her campaign, proposed expanding the workforce, especially for women, through both private and public investments, better benefits and lower healthcare costs for workers, and a reformed, more balanced tax code. Her goal, she said, was to create more "pathways" into the middle class.

"The defining challenge of our time is clear," she said. "We must raise incomes for hard working Americans so they can afford a middle class life."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton drew a stark comparison with her counterparts on the Republican side of the race. She took aim first at Jeb Bush, who Clinton pounced on last week for saying that "people need to work longer hours" in an interview with the New Hampshire Union Leader.

"Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day, or the teacher who in that classroom or the trucker who drives all night," she said. "They do not need a lecture, they need a raise."

But Bush was not talking about the work ethic of Americans. In a press conference with reporters after a town hall in Hudson, New Hampshire, he said that his words had been "taken out of context" and that he was referring to the need for people to have the opportunity for full-time work.

John Dickerson's field notes: When the race ends, will political dynasties become allies?

"If we're going to grow the economy people need to stop being part-time workers, they need to have access to greater opportunities to work," Bush said.

Clinton went on to attack by name Sen. Marco Rubio on his tax reform plan, calling it "bad economics" to cut taxes for the wealthy, and Gov. Scott Walker, whom she said has "made [his] name stomping on workers' rights." Walker will formally enter the race Monday night in Waukesha, Wisconsin, the site of his 2012 recall election victory.

Five things to know about Scott Walker

"I will fight back against these mean-spirited attacks," she said.

Though Clinton made Republicans her main foil as she laid out her plans, she also differentiated herself from Bernie Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont who has recently been gaining on her in the polls. Sanders' arguments for promoting economic fairness -- in part by reducing the amount of wealth going to the richest Americans -- are helping him to draw crowds numbering in the thousands at his campaign rallies.

Sanders' definition of the "defining challenge" is different from Clinton's. He uses the phrase to describe the wealth gap between poor and working Americans and the wealthy and said in an interview with the Washington Post that he would sacrifice economic growth in favor of redistribution. Though narrowing that gap is part of the plan she described Monday, Clinton distinguished herself from Sanders by emphasizing that the middle class must rise along with corporate profits and executive compensation.

States where minimum wage covers the rent

Clinton proposed measures like raising the minimum wage and investing in an infrastructure bank to create jobs, both which Sanders also supports, but also talked about immigration as an "engine of strong growth" and called on companies to expand profit-sharing programs. And while Sanders has called definitively for a breakup of the big banks, Clinton introduced a more nuanced plan to regulate the financial industry.

"We have to go beyond Dodd-Frank," she said. "Too-big-to-fail is still too big of a problem."

Clinton said major financial institutions today are still "too complex" and that a "shadow banking system" of hedge funds and high frequency trading is creating new threats to American consumers.

"While institutions have paid large fines and in some cases, admitted guilt, too often it has seemed that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences or none at all," she said. "This is wrong and under my watch, it will change."

Clinton laid the groundwork for a separate policy speech on Wall Street reform, as well as a series of more specific announcements in the coming weeks on other economic policies like wage growth, college affordability and paid leave. Clinton will travel to New Hampshire later this week, where she is expected to talk more about incentives to encourage corporate profit-sharing.

Hillary Clinton Focuses On Middle-Class Wages In Sweeping Economic Policy Speech // HuffPo // Samantha Lachman – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton focused on the problem of stagnant middle-class wages on Monday in the first major economic policy speech of her presidential campaign.

In sweeping remarks at the progressive New School in New York City, the Democratic candidate said that higher wages are driven by strong, fair and long-term growth, offering policy proposals that fit into each of those three categories. Clinton praised the policies pursued by President Barack Obama, but suggested that more needs to be done to help middle-class families. Her message echoed themes espoused by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), who has made her mark on the Democratic Party by arguing that the economy is rigged against the middle class.

Clinton's speech also name-checked three of the leading Republican presidential hopefuls -- former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio -- and criticized their economic philosophies.

At the beginning of her address, Clinton suggested that the economy is "not delivering the way that it should" for the middle class.

"It still seems to most Americans that I have spoken with that it is stacked for those at the top," Clinton said, criticizing the concept of trickle-down economics for concentrating wealth at the top while leaving middle- and lower-income Americans with less.

"Twice now a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess left behind," she said, praising the economic records of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, and Obama. "We have to build a growth and fairness economy -- you can't have one without the other."

Though Clinton lauded Obama for saving the automobile industry, proposing new rules for overtime pay and passing the Dodd-Frank and Affordable Care Acts, the crux of the speech was that other policies that could further boost paychecks have yet to be enacted.

"The defining economic challenge of our time is clear: We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middle-class life," Clinton said. "We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country."

Progressives have criticized the former secretary of state for not coming out against the Trans-Pacific Partnership being pushed by the Obama administration. While Monday's speech did not add to the remarks Clinton has already made on the subject, she did say that the expansion in global trade has hollowed out America's manufacturing industry. She added that the United States needs to "set a high bar for trade agreements" but also "be prepared to walk away" if the agreements don't meet the administration's standards.

The speech also called out large corporations for focusing on "short-termism" rather than long-term investments. While Clinton talked about the public investments she'd make -- in infrastructure, faster broadband networks, renewable energy, and scientific and medical research -- she also said corporations could do more on their end.

"Many business leaders see this. They've talked to me about. One has called it the problem of 'quarterly capitalism,'" she said. "They say everything's focused on the next earnings report or the short-term share price. The result is too little attention on the sources of long-term growth: research and development, physical capital, and talent."

Clinton said she'd support an apprenticeship tax credit as an incentive for companies to hire and train new workers.

"I'm not talking about charity – I'm talking about clear-eyed capitalism," she explained. "Many companies have prospered by improving wages and training their workers that then yield higher productivity, better service, and larger profits ... Workers are assets. Investing in them pays off. Higher wages pay off. And training pays off."

Clinton decried the decline in women's labor force participation compared to other developed nations, and said she'd work to reduce barriers to women entering the workforce by fighting for affordable childcare, equal pay for equal work and paid leave.

"These challenges have been dismissed as 'women's issues' -- that day is over," Clinton said.

In the section dedicated to "fair growth," Clinton pledged to defend "and enhance" Social Security and to protect Obama's health care law while working to reduce out-of-pocket costs. She also alluded to companies like Uber, saying she'd crack down on businesses that classify their workers as independent contractors in order to avoid providing benefits.

"This 'on demand' or so-called 'gig economy' is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future," she said.

Clinton took the opportunity to criticize Bush, who said last week that Americans need to work longer hours, by saying that Americans need a raise rather than a lecture. (Bush later said that he had really been talking about involuntary part-time workers.) She also called Rubio's economic proposals a "budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy."

But she reserved even more condemnation for Walker's fights against unions in Wisconsin, suggesting that Republican governors like him had made their name "stomping on workers' rights."

"It's time to stand up to efforts across our country to undermine worker bargaining power, which has been proven again and again to drive up wages," Clinton said. "I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

Addressing the issue of financial regulation, Clinton said "we have to go beyond Dodd-Frank" to impose additional protections on high-risk trading and hedge funds, while getting more serious about accountability for those institutions on Wall Street that break the law.

Clinton's comments about financial institutions appeared to target progressive voters who may worry that her economic policies would resemble the deregulatory push undertaken by her husband in the 1990s. The proposals she outlined also aimed to defend her left flank against her two leading Democratic primary challengers, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

But the O'Malley campaign insists that its proposals are more developed than Clinton's.

“Rebuilding the American Dream will take more than vague promises," said Lis Smith, O’Malley's deputy campaign manager, in a statement following Clinton's speech. "That’s why Governor O’Malley has set bold, progressive, and specific goals to make our economy work for more Americans."

In a lighter moment on Monday, Clinton said she's guessed that her granddaughter Charlotte's first word will be "enough" because she's been read to incessantly. The quip came while Clinton was emphasizing that she'd press for universal pre-school and support other early childhood education efforts.

And in a tease of a proposal she said she'd develop more in a New Hampshire campaign stop Thursday, Clinton said that she'd back company profit-sharing, calling the proposal a "win-win" for employers and employees.

"Hardworking Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," she explained. "So I will propose ways to encourage companies to share profits with their employees. That will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets."

Hillary Clinton: Wage Growth Is The “Defining” Economic Problem Today // BuzzFeed // Ruby Cramer – July 13, 2015

In a wide-ranging speech on the economy — the first of her campaign — Hillary Clinton cast wage stagnation as the “defining” challenge for America’s next president, and outlined as the solution an extensive, diverse set of proposals to encourage “growth and fairness,” raise the minimum wage, cut taxes for the middle-class, lift them on the wealthy, and strengthen working families by implementing policies for paid leave, equal pay for women, and earned sick days.

“We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so that they can afford a middle class life,” Clinton said. Lifting wages, she told the crowd, will be “my mission from my first day as president to the last.”

Clinton, now three months into the race for the Democratic nomination, spoke for about an hour on Monday at the New School in New York City on a broad array of topics, promising to deliver more specific proposals in the coming weeks.

She will, for instance, make more detailed remarks on her ideas for tax code simplification, college affordability, profit-sharing, and paid leave.

About 200 people attended the speech. A mix of surrogates, supporters, and donors, could also be spotted throughout the auditorium, including Van Jones, the pundit and liberal advocate, and Tom Nides, the Morgan Stanley executive and former State Department official. (The campaign’s finance director, Dennis Cheng, also greeted guests in the lobby before the speech began.)

The speech Monday was put together following a months-long period of outreach to more than 200 domestic policy experts, according to the campaign. Outside advisers included Neera Tanden, the head of the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank closely aligned with the campaign, as well as former administration advisers such as Gene Sperling and Alan Blinder.

Clinton touched on some topics more broadly than others: One of her more oblique references was to the so-called "gig economy," and the rise of companies like Uber, which has embodied a long-term shift toward freelance and contract work.

The industry, she acknowledged, has created "exciting opportunities" and unleashed "innovation." But Clinton also said the companies have raised "hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like."

She concluded that these and other "technological advances" influencing the economy were not "going away" anytime soon. "But they don't determine our destiny," Clinton said. "The choices we make as a nation matter."

The speech on Monday, details aside, was framed as a sweeping roadmap for Clinton's economic vision and an overview of her differences with Republicans, three of whom she mentioned by name: Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker.

"For 35 years, Republicans have argued that if we give more wealth to those at the top," Clinton said, "it will trickle down to everyone else. Yet every time they have a chance to try that approach, it explodes the national debt, concentrates wealth even more and does practically nothing to help hard-working Americas."

Her proposals did not differ drastically with those already outlined by Martin O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland, and Bernie Sanders, the U.S. senator from Vermont — two Democratic competitors who have made tough rhetoric on Wall Street and income inequality the central piece of their campaigns.

Her administration, Clinton said, would appoint regulators who believe "too big to fail is still too big a problem." In a comment that was seen as a contrast with a more passive approach by President Obama, Clinton promised to "prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or other wrongdoing."

She added that problems of inequality "are not limited to the big banks that get all the headlines," describing a "shadow banking system" of hedge funds, high-frequency traders, and other new entities that "see little oversight at all."

Clinton received an initial positive response to the speech from progressive groups that have cast Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts as a liberal benchmark.

Democracy for America — a group that until earlier this summer was waging a draft movement to recruit Warren into the race — released a statement praising the speech as consistent with the Massachusetts senator and her economic priorities.

The remarks reflect a "clear understanding that the Democratic Party and the vast majority of the American people want a president who will fight alongside [Warren] and refuse to kowtow to wealthy and powerful interests," said Jim Dean, the chair of Democracy for America, which has not formally endorsed a candidate.

But just as Clinton was closing her speech, one unhappy protestor presented a jarring interruption, yelling repeatedly, "Will you restore Glass Steagall?"

Hillary Channels Her Inner Springsteen // Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – July 13, 2015

"Maybe it's the grandmother in me," Hillary Clinton said Monday, "but I believe that part of public service is planting trees under whose shade you'll never sit."

The line, which can be attributed to a Canadian farmer named Nelson Henderson, came toward the end of Clinton's economic address at The New School in Manhattan, but it neatly summarizes the entirety of her agenda.

It's when Clinton is describing big-picture policies that she sounds most at ease. But when it comes to Hopes and Dreams and Everyday Americans, she sounds like latter-day Bruce Springsteen.

On his 2009 album Working on a Dream he sang of the "Queen of the Supermarket" who bags his groceries amid the "aisles and aisles of dreams." You get the feeling, listening to the song, that Springsteen, however noble his intention to pay tribute to the average worker, has probably not set foot in a supermarket in a very, very long time.

Likewise Clinton uneasily meditated on the plight of "the single mom" but it wasn't clear if this was one particular mom or a composite of many moms or just the proverbial single mom, or "the grandmother" who provides child care but can't live on her paycheck, or "the young entrepreneur" who wants to buy a bowling alley, or the "millions of hardworking Americans [who] tell similar stories."

In preparation for today's speech, Clinton and her aides reportedly spent months consulting with over 200 domestic policy advisers, including Neera Tanden, an adviser for her 2008 White House bid, and two former Obama Administration aides: Christina Romer and Jared Bernstein.

Standing in front of 12 American flags at a Hillaryclinton.com-stamped lectern, Clinton spent 45 minutes making a series of ambitious policy promises to the packed West Village auditorium: higher incomes for the middle class through a change to the tax code to incentivize companies to "share profits with their employees"; the appointment of harsher bank regulators; "breaking down barriers" to get more Americans—"especially women"—into the workforce; increased investment in clean renewable energy; "comprehensive immigration reform"; and the reining in of "excessive risks on Wall Street."

Clinton uneasily meditated on the plight of "the single mom" who she talked to, but it wasn't clear if this was one particular mom or a composite of many moms or just a proverbial single mom.

Clinton's economic philosophy is preventive rather than prescriptive.

She criticized short-term fixes for financial woes and decried a business environment which emphasizes end-of-quarter numbers rather than overall health.

Clinton focused her fire at the Republican field, hitting Marco Rubio, Scott Walker, and Jeb Bush by name, and tearing into trickle-down policies which, she claimed, have consistently led to disasters that Democrats, including her husband, have been forced to bail the country out of. Her Democratic rivals went unacknowledged, but traces of their influence were everywhere.

She borrowed the Howard Beale rallying cries of Elizabeth Warren and her left-wing primary rival Bernie Sanders,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

but adapted them to fit her tamer message. (In May, when The New Yorker asked Warren if Clinton was co-opting her message, Warren responded, “Eh.”)

Whereas Warren declares “the game rigged,” Clinton said (as she has since her April announcement) that families feel “the deck is stacked.”

And the Sanders line, “If a bank is too big to fail, it is too big to exist,” was edited to say the regulators she appoints will “understand that too big to fail is still too big a problem.”

Warren and Sanders have called for jail time for big bank CEOs who helped cause the financial crisis. Clinton tiptoed up to that line and then ran away scared.

“While institutions have paid large fines and, in some cases, admitted guilt,” Clinton said, “too often it has seemed that the human beings responsible get off with limited consequences or none at all, even when they’ve already pocketed the gains.” She continued, “This is wrong, and on my watch it will change.” How? She didn’t say, instead promising, as another Democratic Martin O’Malley did last week, that she would “rein in” Wall Street. “Over the course of this campaign,” she said, “I will offer plans to rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and ensure that stock markets work for everyday investors, not just high-frequency traders and those with the best or fastest connections.”

The Numbers Behind Hillary Clinton’s Economic Vision // Five Thirty Eight // Ben Casselman and Andrew Flowers – July 13, 2015

There was a single thread running through Hillary Clinton’s big economics speech on Monday: the importance of raising wages for working Americans. That’s no coincidence: The six-year-old economic recovery has succeeded in restoring corporate profits and creating jobs, but it hasn’t brought pay raises for many workers. Wage growth is running ahead of inflation, but it remains low and hasn’t accelerated as the economy as a whole has improved. And as Clinton stressed throughout her speech, many of those problems predate the recession, suggesting deeper structural challenges in the U.S. economy.

“The defining economic challenge of our time is clear,” Clinton said in a speech at New York City’s New School. “We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans, so they can afford a middle-class life. We must drive steady income growth that lifts up families, and lifts up our country.”

Clinton’s speech was light on specific proposals — those will arrive in coming weeks, according to her campaign — but it nonetheless represented one of the most comprehensive economic policy visions articulated to date by any of the major presidential candidates.

Many of Clinton’s themes will sound familiar to anyone who’s been listening to President Obama over the past eight years. She wants to boost incomes for the middle class, raise taxes on the wealthy and make it easier for parents to juggle work and family. But she also highlighted issues that haven’t been as central to Obama’s message, such as encouraging companies to share more of their profits with workers.

Clinton wasn’t shy about criticizing leading Republican candidates, calling out Jeb Bush, Scott Walker and Marco Rubio by name. Notably absent from her speech, however, was any reference to her opponents for the Democratic nomination, including Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley. But Clinton’s focus on inequality and wages, along with her criticism of Wall Street and measured skepticism of free trade agreements, was no doubt partly intended to shore up support among the liberal wing of her party.

Here are a few key passages from Clinton’s speech, along with some context and analysis. (Quotes are from a preliminary transcript.)

Previous generations of Americans built the greatest economy and strongest middle class the world has ever known on the promise of a basic bargain: If you work hard and do your part, you should be able to get ahead. And when you get ahead, America gets ahead. But over the past several decades, that bargain has eroded.

The core of Clinton's message is that middle-class incomes have stagnated in recent years, not just during the recession and its aftermath but even during better economic times. That's true, though the middle class's struggles are sometimes exaggerated.

The typical (median) U.S. household earned just less than $52,000 before taxes in 2013, the latest year for which full data is available. Adjusting for inflation, that's less than in 1989, suggesting that the middle class has experienced two and a half decades of income stagnation.

Reality isn't quite that grim. The Census Bureau's income statistics don't account for the fact that the typical American household is smaller today than it was 25 years ago. That's a big deal because a single person living on $50,000 has a much higher standard of living than a family of six trying to squeeze by on the same amount. Adjust for household size, and incomes are up significantly since the late 1980s.

Even adjusting for household size, however, median income has been more or less stagnant since 2000. Some economists propose other adjustments to the census figures, such as using a different measure of inflation and looking at after-tax rather than pre-tax income. But while the exact figures are in dispute, the overall trend is not: Income growth has been far slower since 2000 than in the decades before.

The measure of our success must be how much incomes rise for hard-working families, not just for successful CEOs and money managers and not just some arbitrary growth targets untethered to people's lives and livelihoods.

Clinton didn't mention him by name until later in her speech, but there's little doubt this line was intended as a shot at former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, one of the leading candidates on the Republican side of the campaign. Bush has pledged to deliver a 4 percent annual growth rate, which he has argued is the best way to help the middle class.

Clinton says economic growth alone doesn't necessarily translate into more money for the middle class. There's evidence to back that up: In recent decades, the share of national income that goes to workers has fallen while the share going to corporate profits has risen. Taken at face value, the numbers mean workers aren't benefiting as much from economic growth as they used to.

Some economists, however, have recently questionedwhether workers' piece of the economic pie has shrunk as much as the official figures show, though they don't dispute that the so-called labor share fell significantly during the recession. Moreover, even if the long-term decline is real, it has been a global phenomenon, affecting virtually the entire developed world, including many countries with very different economic systems than the U.S.'s. That raises questions about whether Clinton — or any president — could do much to reverse the trend.

It's also worth noting that the one recent period when the labor share clearly rose was in the late 1990s, which was also the last time economic growth exceeded 4 percent for an extended period. That doesn't guarantee a repeat performance, but it does hint that a period of particularly strong growth can have benefits for workers up and down the earnings spectrum. (The late 1990s were also, of course, the last time a president named Clinton was in office.)

We also have to invest in our students and our teachers at every level, and in the coming weeks and months, I will lay out specific steps to improve our schools, make college truly affordable and help Americans refinance their student debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This was nearly the only reference to college in Clinton's speech, which might seem surprising given her focus on income: For decades, Democrats have stressed expanding access to college as a key way to reduce income inequality and expand the middle class.

On an individual level, there's little doubt that going to college remains the clearest pathway to a good job: Theunemployment rate for college graduates was 2.5 percent in June, compared with 5.4 percent for those with only a high school diploma. The typical young bachelor's degree holder in 2013 earned two-thirds more than the typical high school graduate, and one-third more than the typical worker with an associate degree, according to census data.

But while a college education can clearly improve an individual's job prospects, some economists — including many on the left — argue that education can't do much to reduce inequality in the country as a whole. As more and more Americans go to college, the supply of college graduates has grown; more than 35 percent of Americans ages 25 to 34 now have at least a bachelor's degree, up from less than 10 percent 30 years ago. That's fine as long as employers keep needing more college-educated workers, but recent research suggests that demand for college graduates has leveled off or is even declining. Perhaps as a result, the college-wage premium — how much more college graduates earn than nongraduates — has stopped rising.

The movement of women into the American workforce over the past 40 years was responsible for more than $3.5 trillion in economic growth. But that progress has stalled.

Another major plank of Clinton's economic plan is offering families, and working mothers in particular, family-friendly policies like paid parental leave. Compared with most wealthy nations, the U.S. offers workers less paid (and unpaid) parental leave. According to a 2008 analysis by the left-leaning Center for Economic and Policy Research, the U.S. ranks 20th out of 21 wealthy countries in offering two-parent families a combined 24 weeks of unpaid parental leave — and that is only for the 60 percent of workers covered through the Family and Medical Leave Act. Currently, only 12 percent of Americans get paid parental leave through their job, and predictably those benefits are more common for higher-income people.

Clinton argued that in addition to promoting fairness, expanding paid parental leave can have serious economic benefits. One way these policies could affect the economy as a whole is by helping to reverse the troubling long-term decline in the share of the population that's participating in the labor force. The so-called labor force participation rate — the share of the population that's either working or actively looking for work — has been falling for years and stands at its lowest level since the late 1970s. The decline poses a major economic challenge because it leaves fewer workers to support the nonworking population.

The drop has been particularly pronounced among men, whose participation rate has been falling for decades. But just as important has been the leveling off and then eventual decline in participation among women. Female labor force participation peaked at about 60 percent in 2000 and has been falling ever since. The U.S., which once had one of the highest female labor force participation rates in the world, according to data from the OECD, now ranks below Latvia, Estonia, Slovenia and a bunch of other countries.

Liberal economists, including those on Clinton's team, have long argued that the U.S. could help more women work if it offered more generous family benefits. Research estimates that the U.S.'s stingier parental leave policies explain about 30 percent of its relatively low female labor-force participation rate. Some states have already instituted family-friendly policies similar to those outlined in Clinton's speech. California, Rhode Island and New Jerseyfund insurance programs that provide four to six weeks of paid family care leave. Advocates for paid parental leave policies also cite other economic benefits, such as reduced employee turnover.

Today's marketplace focuses too much on the short-term, like second-to-second financial trading and quarterly earnings reports, and too little on long-term investments.

Clinton sketched out several ideas for reforming corporate America. She advocated for profit-sharing policies, which offer workers an ownership piece in the company they work for, with the goal to boost worker productivity and to distribute the company's stock gains more evenly. Clinton said "studies show that profit sharing that gives everyone a stake in the company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets." In a speech later this week in New Hampshire, she will have more to say on this issue.

Clinton also decried "quarterly capitalism," or the short-termism of corporate America. Citing the declining rates of business investment in things like factories and research labs and the explosion of share buybacks and dividends, she pledged to better align corporate decisions for long-term growth. But she didn't say how she would do that. Some potential policies can be found in a report published by the left-leaning (and Clinton-allied) Center for American Progress earlier this year. To encourage more long-term thinking by executives, the report proposed lengthening the time before executive stock options are fully vested, and limiting how many options executives can exercise. Clinton suggested other reforms that would affect corporate America, including the Buffett rule — named after billionaire Warren Buffett — that would institute a minimum tax of 30 percent on those making more than $1 million a year. She also proposed closing the carried-interest loophole, which allows those who make a bulk of their income from capital gains (such as hedge fund managers) to pay a lower overall tax rate.

Small businesses create more than 60 percent of new American jobs on net, so they have to be a top priority. I've said I want to be the small-business president, and I mean it. And throughout this campaign, I'm going to be talking about how we empower entrepreneurs with less red tape, easier access to capital, tax relief and simplification.

Politicians love to talk about the importance of small businesses, but economic research has found that the real drivers of job growth aren't small businesses but new businesses: Fast-growing startups account for a disproportionate share of hiring. New companies are also key sources of innovation and productivity gains.

But entrepreneurship in the U.S. is in trouble. The rate at which Americans start new businesses has been falling for 30 years, a decline that cuts across industries and geographies. The trend may be surprising given the buzz around Uber, Airbnb and other high-profile Silicon Valley startups. But for all the talk of "disruption," data from multiple sources suggests that the American economy has become more comfortable for big incumbent businessesand less hospitable to entrepreneurs.

Clinton's pledge to cut red tape and provide easier access to capital could just as easily have come from a speech from one of her Republican opponents. But the truth is economists aren't sure what's behind the decline in startups, which makes it hard to develop policies to combat it.

Talent is universal; you find it everywhere. But opportunity is not. There are nearly 6 million young people aged 16 to 24 in America today who are not in school or at work. The numbers for young people of color are particularly staggering. A quarter of young black men and nearly 15 percent of all Latino youth cannot find a job.

Clinton's decision to highlight young people who are neither working nor in school is notable because it's an economic measure that tends to get relatively little attention in the U.S. In Europe, the concept is so widely discussed that even mainstream news outlets routinely refer to "NEETs," short for "not in employment, education or training." In some European countries such as Greece and Italy, more than 30 percent of people ages 20 to 24 are NEETs.

The problem isn't nearly as severe in the U.S., but it is still significant. Nearly 19 percent of American 20- to 24-year-olds were neither working nor in school in 2013, according to OECD data. That's little better than in the worst of the recession and is up from 15.5 percent in 2005. And as Clinton said, the numbers are far worse for many minority groups. OECD doesn't break down its data by race, but according to data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 22 percent of black men ages 16 to 24 are neither in school nor working, compared with 16 percent of all Americans in that age group.

Hours after Hillary Clinton vowed to crack down on Wall Street, an adviser said she has no plans to push a bank break-up bill beloved by the left.

Alan Blinder, a former Federal Reserve official now advising the Clinton campaign, told Reuters Monday that she has no plans to push for the return of a banking law that separates commercial and investment banks.

Liberals frequently argue that the Glass-Steagall Act, whose repeal was signed into law by President Bill Clinton, would have helped minimize the damage of the last financial crisis. But Blinder, who worked in the Clinton White House as well, said that is not in the cards for Hillary Clinton.

“You’re not going to see Glass-Steagall,” he said, adding that he had spoken directly to Clinton about the issue.

That law separated traditional banking activity from riskier investment banking, and its proponents argue it if it had stayed in place, the fallout from the last financial crisis would have been much less severe.

Liberal critics of Wall Street frequently call for a return to that firewall, and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) proposed its reinstatement earlier this month.

During a major economic speech Monday, Hillary Clinton was actually interrupted by a heckler calling on her to reinstate the law.

But former President Clinton has argued against such calls, pointing out that the banks that collapsed would not have been altered by Glass-Steagall, and bristled at claims his administration was too friendly to the financial sector.

In a lengthy economic address in New York, Hillary Clinton laid out her economic platform as a presidential candidate, and included a lengthy section vowing tough rules for Wall Street.

She said Washington must “go beyond” the Dodd-Frank financial reform law, calling banks “still too complex and too risky.” She vowed to prosecute banks and bankers that break the law, as well as appoint tough regulators that would crack down on “too big to fail” financial institutions.

On matters like banker prosecutions, Clinton sounded similar to Warren, the left’s most prominent voice on financial matters. But when it comes to Glass-Steagall, it appears the two differ.

Clinton to Bush: Workers need raise, not lecture // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton rebuked her Republican presidential rival Jeb Bush on Monday for his assertion that Americans need to work longer hours.

“Let him tell that to the nurse that stands on her feet all day, or the teacher who is in the classroom, or the trucker that drives all night,” she said Monday during an economic speech in New York City.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

Bush received widespread criticism from Democrats after comments last week that Americans "need to work longer hours," a comment his campaign later clarified meant to highlight the lack of full-time job opportunities in the current economic landscape.

Clinton zeroed in on the line as symptomatic of the nation's deep inequality. She panned inequality as a main "drag" on the economy and chided the GOP for relying on "trickle-down economics."

She also targeted two other GOP candidates: Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and Gov. Scott Walker (Wis.), who officially announced his campaign on Monday.

Clinton called Rubio's tax plan, which she argues would cut taxes for households making $3 million a year by almost $240,000, as a "budget-busting giveaway."

And while linking the dwindling power of labor unions to a rise in inequality, she bashed Walker for making his name on "stomping on workers' rights" and promised to push back against the "mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

Bush's supporters have raked in more than $100 million for his super PAC in the hopes of countering Clinton's vast fundraising networks. And conservatives are bullish on Walker and Rubio's chances against her as well.

Clinton's broad economic speech included a widespread list of proposals including banking reform, profit-sharing for businesses and domestic policy reform that she framed as essential to jump-starting the American economy.

GOP field knocks Clinton on sharing economy // The Hill // Mario Trujillo – July 13, 2015

Republican presidential candidates are knocking Hillary Clinton after she delivered a speech claiming the so-called sharing economy, made up of companies such as Uber and Lyft faced "hard questions."

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul came out with the sharpest barb, saying the country "shouldn't take advice on the sharing economy from someone who has been driven around in a limo for 30 years," referring to Clinton's revelation last year that she hadn't driven a car since 1996.

Former Gov. Jeb Bush's (R-Fla.) campaign released a statement saying, "Secretary Clinton's antiquated proposals protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity and 21st Century companies like Uber that are creating jobs."

In her broad economic speech, Clinton keyed in on the "gig economy," cautioning that it raises concerns about workplace protections and said they must take into account the changing business landscape.

Clinton said the measure of success is how much income can be boosted for middle-class families. She alluded to companies like Uber, which is currently the subject of legal challenges from drivers who say they should be treated as employees not just as contractors. She also seemed to reference companies like Airbnb, which allows people to rent out apartments or rooms, and Etsy, an online market for the artists and craftsmen.

"Many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing websites, selling products they design themselves at home, or even driving their own car," she said. "This 'on demand' or so-called 'gig economy' is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future."

The Internet Association, which represents many of those companies, released a cautious response touting the benefits of the sharing economy.

"The sharing economy empowers people to determine when, where, and how they want to live and work in ways unimaginable just a few years ago," the group said. "It is important to remember that innovation in the sharing economy has led to unprecedented independence, flexibility, and autonomy that expands choices for all Americans."

Veering left, Hillary Clinton puts profit-sharing in economic plan // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Monday called wage inequality the "defining economic challenge of our time" as she unveiled a wide-reaching economic platform that veers toward the liberal policies championed by her main rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.).

"As the shadow of crisis recedes and longer-term challenges come into focus, I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," Clinton said at The New School in New York City.

"You can't have one without the other. We can't create enough jobs and new businesses without more growth."

Clinton's 40-minute speech provided the clearest look yet at the economic proposals she plans to champion while running for the White House. The expansive address — delivered the day before she visits Capitol Hill to meet with Democrats — included a litany of specific plans that she said would boost economic growth and help reduce income inequality.

One of the most attention-grabbing proposals was a call for encouraging businesses to share their profits with employees. She said she would say more about that plan in New Hampshire on Thursday, but said the idea would involve a change to the tax code.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," Clinton said.

"That will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets."

Clinton's focus on economics come as her primary opponent in the Democratic race, Sanders, continues to draw strong crowds.

While Clinton still holds a mammoth polling edge over Sanders, he's been gaining ground. But while Clinton criticized a group of top Republican challengers in the speech on Monday, she steered clear of mentioning Sanders.

Hillary Clinton's Big Economic Speech Abridged to 500 Words // Mother Jones // Kevin Drum – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton gave her big economic speech today. As is my wont, I plowed through the transcript and excerpted only those parts that are actual policy proposals. This is sometimes a judgment call, but I think I got most of them. I didn't include any vague prescriptions that she promised to explain in detail in later speeches.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By my count, Hillary's laundry list includes 26 specific proposals, some with more detail than others. Not bad, even for a Clinton. So for those of you who aren't interested in the blah blah blah, and just want the meat, here's the Reader's Digest version of the speech, condensed to about two minutes of reading time.

Let me begin with strong growth.

....Empower entrepreneurs with less red tape, easier access to capital, tax relief and simplification.... business tax reform to spur investment in America, closing those loopholes that reward companies for sending jobs and profits overseas....comprehensive immigration reform....infrastructure bank that can channel more public and private funds, channel those funds to finance world-class airports, railways, roads, bridges and ports....greater investments in cleaner, renewable energy right now....fund the scientific and medical research that spawns innovative companies and creates entire new industries....breaking down barriers so more Americans participate more fully in the workforce — especially women....family-friendly policies....fair pay and fair scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days, child care are essential to our competitiveness and growth.

....Beyond strong growth, we also need fair growth.

....We have to raise the minimum wage and implement President Obama's new rules on overtime....crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages....defending and enhancing Social Security....encourage companies to share profits with their employees....reforming our tax code....Buffett Rule....closing the carried interest loophole....the decline of unions may be responsible for a third of the increase of inequality among men....we have to get serious about supporting workers....every 4-year old in America [should] have access to high-quality preschool in the next ten years....80% of your brain is physically formed by age of three....intervention to help those often-stressed out young moms understand more about what they can do and avoid the difficulties that stand in the way of their being able to get their child off to the best start....reviving the New Markets Tax Credit and Empowerment Zones to create greater incentives to invest in poor and remote areas.

....The third key driver of income alongside strong growth and fair growth must be long-term growth.

....A new $1,500 apprenticeship tax credit....reform capital gains taxes to reward longer-term investments that create jobs more than just quick trades....[Make] sure stock buybacks aren't being used only for an immediate boost in share prices....Empowering outside investors who want to build companies but discouraging "cut and run" shareholders who act more like old-school corporate raiders....Serious risks are emerging from institutions in the so-called "shadow banking" system....I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that Too Big To Fail is still too big a problem....ensure that no firm is too complex to manage or oversee....prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or other criminal wrongdoing....when the government recovers money from corporations or individuals for harming the public, it should go into a separate trust fund to benefit the public.

And the obligatory paean to bipartisanship and comity:

....You know passing legislation is not the only way to drive progress. As President, I'll use the power to convene, connect, and collaborate to build partnerships that actually get things done. Because above all, we have to break out of the poisonous partisan gridlock and focus on the long-term needs of our country.

Clinton Has Two Economic Messages: She's Not Jeb Bush, and She's a Lot like Elizabeth Warren // Mother Jones // Patrick Caldwell – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton's first major economic speech of the 2016 campaign had one clear target: Jeb Bush. The former Florida governor and top Republican fundraiser has pledged that, if elected president, he'd ensure 4 percent annual growth for the country. Clinton acknowledged the importance of growth but, without directly naming Bush, said that wasn't enough. “I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," she said. "You can’t have one without the other."

In a speech at the New School in New York City Monday morning, Clinton laid out a broad vision of what she'd do to make the economy fairer should she win next year—though it was scant on policy details, with many promises of specific proposals to come in the next few weeks. "The defining economic challenge of our time is clear," she said. "We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so they can afford a middle-class life." Clinton promised to bring more women into the workforce with family-friendly policies, amend the tax code that lets the rich pay lower rates, end the misclassification of employees and contractors, and fix business incentives to focus on the long term rather than quarterly reports.

Clinton avoided discussing her Democratic primary rivals in a speech that appeared tailored to the general election. Clinton painted Republicans as obsessed with trickle-down economics and accused Marco Rubio of promoting a tax plan that would channel money to the rich.

But Bush got the most attention. "You may have heard Gov. Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours," Clinton said. "Well, he must not have met very many American workers." Clinton ticked off a list of professions where full-time work no longer guarantees people a sufficient livelihood. "They don't need a lecture, they need a raise." Clinton also defended the economic legacies of Presidents Bill Clinton and Barack Obama with a dig at the past two Bush presidencies. "Twice now in the past 20 years," she said, "a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess left behind."

Though she didn't discuss Bernie Sanders or Martin O'Malley, the anti-Wall Street crusader Sen. Elizabeth Warren—a liberal favorite who declined to mount a primary challenge against Clinton—was clearly on Clinton's mind. Clinton's remarks came into sharpest focus when she discussed the need for Wall Street reform. "Too big to fail is still too big a problem," Clinton said, vowing to appoint regulators who would keep the banks in check.

She borrowed one of Warren's favorite attacks: that the Obama administration has been too deferential to banks by being unwilling to use prosecutorial powers against specific Wall Street executives. "We will prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or other wrongdoing," Clinton promised.

It's not just the major banks, Clinton said, but the hedge funds and nebulous financial firms that constitute the shadow-banking sector that need to be regulated. “We have to go beyond Dodd-Frank," she said, referring to the financial regulation law. "Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky.”

Hillary Slaps Wall Street, Demands Companies Share Profits // Washington Times // Joseph Curl – July 13, 2015

In an expansive economic speech on Monday, multimillionaire Hillary Clinton on Monday called wage inequality the “defining economic challenge of our time” and demanded that companies share profits with workers.

“As the shadow of crisis recedes and longer-term challenges come into focus, I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy,” Clinton said at The New School in New York City.

“You can’t have one without the other. We can’t create enough jobs and new businesses without more growth.”

Clinton also accused former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush of an inability to understand Americans’ needs, claiming Republicans won’t help those stuck in the middle-class.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, she said, “must not have met many American workers,” and, pointing to a comment that Bush made about Americans working longer hours, said: “They don’t need a lecture. They need a raise.”

Clinton also said she would hold Wall Street accountable.

“Stories of misconduct by individuals and institutions in the financial industry are shocking,” Clinton said. “HSBC allowing drug cartels to launder money, 5 major banks pleading guilty to felony charges for conspiring currency exchange and interest rates. There can be no justification or tolerance for this kind of criminal behavior.”

But the Weekly Standard reported that the Clintons received $200,000 from HSBC in 2011. The bank donated as mush as $1 million to the Clinton Foundation, the site said.

“In 2011, Bill Clinton was paid $200,000 for a speech to HSBC Securities (USA) Inc. in Key Largo, FL. In 2007, the Clintons sold between $15,001 and $50,000 in HSBC Holdings PLC. And HSBC has donated between $500,000 and $1,000,000 to the Clinton Foundation,” America Rising reports.

“Hillary Clinton attacked the financial criminal behavior of financial organizations during her economic speech this morning,” said Jeff Bechdel, America Rising PAC communications director.

“While it sounds like a great talking point, the facts and her own complex web of finances make it difficult for Hillary Clinton to pretend she’s just an ‘everyday American.’”

Details of Hillary Clinton’s liberal economic platform leaked // The Washington Times // S.A. Milller – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton will call for higher taxes on the wealthy and higher pay for everyone else when she presents her economic agenda Monday, but her remedy for income inequality has already come under fire from the right and the left.

In a speech at the New School in New York, Mrs. Clinton will outline a plan that she says will end more than a decade of wage stagnation that has hobbled the middle class and created a vast income gap between the megarich and the working class — a problem that she identifies as the most urgent economic challenge facing the world.

Details of her economic platform, which will be a cornerstone of Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, were leaked over the weekend to reporters, including The New York Times and Washington Post.

The plan is chock full of familiar liberal proposals: increased taxes on the wealthy, a higher federal minimum wage, more government spending on infrastructure projects, new child care benefits, federal subsidies for college tuition and laws to help expand unions.

The former first lady, senator and secretary of state will boast of the record of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who presided over a massive economic expansion that boosted median family income by nearly 15 percent between 1993 and 1999.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal gave Sen. Bernard Sanders backhanded praise over Mrs. ... more >

However, she won't be declaring an end of the era of big government, as her husband did.

Sen. Bernard Sanders, the Vermont independent and avowed socialist who has emerged as Mrs. Clinton's chief rival for the Democratic presidential nomination, said her liberal agenda echoes proposals he's backed for years, and her allegiance to those ideals remains unclear.

"I have spent my political life taking on the big money interests. I have introduced legislation that would break up the large financial institutions on Wall Street. I think, if a bank is too big to fail, it is too big to exist," said Mr. Sanders.

He noted his longtime support for raising the federal minimum wage from the current $7.25 per hour to a "living wage" of $15 per hour. Not until recently did Mrs. Clinton endorse a $15 minimum hourly wage.

He said Mrs. Clinton's positions remain unclear on a range of issues from breaking up Wall Street banks, which Mr. Sanders supports, to President Obama's pending trade deal with Pacific Rim countries and the opposed Keystone XL oil pipeline, both of which Mr. Sanders staunchly opposes.

Mrs. Clinton is not expected to clarify her positions on these or other hot-button issues in the speech, which is being described as a broad overview of her economic philosophy. The Clinton campaign has promised that future speeches will provide details of how she would reform the tax code and crack down on Wall Street.

"I like Hillary Clinton, and I respect Hillary Clinton. And I'm not going to engage in personal attacks against Hillary Clinton," said Mr. Sanders. "But there are differences of opinion that we have which should be the basis for a serious discussion."

The jabs from the right were more pointed.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, a Republican candidate for president, said the proposals from Mrs. Clinton would put America on the same path to bankruptcy as followed by Greece.

"Give Bernie Sanders credit: At least he's willing to call himself a socialist," Mr. Jindal said on "Fox News Sunday." "Hillary and President Obama are taking us down that same path, turning the American dream into the European nightmare."

"We already know what it is going to say," he said of Mrs. Clinton's speech. "It is going to be more taxes, more government spending, more regulations. It's feeding a greedier and greedier government that's going to swallow up the private sector economy."

Another Republican presidential candidate, former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, said Mrs. Clinton's "big government" solutions actually would widen the income gap.

"The truth is, Hillary Clinton's ideas create more income inequality. Why? Because bigger government creates crony capitalism," she said on ABC's "This Week."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When you have a 70,000-page tax code, you've got to be very wealthy, very powerful, very well connected to dig your way through that tax code," said Ms. Fiorina. "What I will continue to point out is the fact that every policy she is pursuing will make income inequality worse, not better, crony capitalism even worse, not better. And, meanwhile, we will continue to crush the businesses that create jobs and middle-class families."

Ms. Fiorina said that she agreed that income inequality is a "huge problem," though she said Mrs. Clinton is wrong about how to narrow the income gap.

"Let's look to the state of California, where I lived for 12 years," she said. "Liberal policies have been in place for decades, and yet there are 111 billionaires — good for them — the highest poverty rates in the nation, the exodus of the middle class, the destruction of industry after industry. Now they're destroying agriculture in California."

She said she agreed with Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a rival for the GOP presidential nomination, who set a goal of 4 percent economic growth rather than the current lethargic rate of 1 percent or 2 percent.

Mrs. Fiorina said the focus should be on the "true engine of economic growth and job creation."

"It has always been small businesses, new businesses, family-owned businesses, community-based businesses that create two-thirds of the jobs and employ half the people," she said. "And we are now crushing those businesses. In fact, we are destroying more businesses in the United States now than are being created for the first time in our history."

Hillary Clinton's economic speech is heavy on attacking Republicans // Washington Times // S.A. Miller – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton jabbed GOP rival Jeb Bush when she presented her economic agenda Monday, hitting the former Florida governor for saying that Americans need to "work longer hours" to spur wage growth.

"He must not have met many American workers," Mrs. Clinton said. "Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day ... to the fast-food workers who march in the streets demanding better pay. They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

Mrs. Clinton has launched repeated attacks on Mr. Bush since he made the comment in New New Hampshire, although Mr. Bush was describing the low worker participation rate during the slow economic recovery.

"They don't need a lecture. They need a raise," Mrs. Clinton said in a speech at the New School in New York City, where outlined a liberal economic agenda that focused on boosting stagnant wage growth for working-class Americans.

She also took aim at other Republican presidential hopefuls, including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who announced his entrance in the race earlier in the day, saying he built his political carrier "stomping" on workers' rights.

Mrs. Clinton said that the scourge of income inequality required the new ideas that she was offering, not the old "trickle down" economic policies that she said Republican continue to promote and which she blamed for both the Great Recession and the concentration of wealth among the richest families.

Her plans included ranged from mandatory paid sick leave and incentives for corporations to provide more profit sharing to raising the minimum wage and giving America's roughly 12 million illegal immigrants a pathway to citizenship.

Hillary hits Clinton Foundation donor in economic speech // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton took aim at a bank that has donated heavily to the Clinton Foundation and paid her husband generous speaking fees.

During a sweeping economic address Monday, Clinton accused British bank HSBC of "laundering" money for "drug cartels" and called for an end to such "criminal behavior" from major financial firms.

HSBC entered a nearly $2 billion agreement with the U.S. in 2013 to lay criminal charges to rest in the wake of findings that the bank had failed to stop "drug kingpins" from laundering money through its channels.

But two years earlier, HSBC was inviting former President Bill Clinton to speak at an event at the swanky Ocean Reef Club in Key Largo, Fla. Bill Clinton was paid $200,000 for the engagement.

It was not the first time Bill Clinton had spoken at HSBC's behest; he also asked the State Department's permission in 2009 to attend an event hosted by the bank in the United Arab Emirates while his wife was secretary of state.

Bill and Hillary Clinton owned between $15,000 and $50,000 in HSBC holdings before Hillary Clinton launched her first presidential campaign, financial disclosure records show.

What's more, HSBC has donated between $500,000 and $1 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton's ties to the London-based bank, first noted by the Republican-aligned group America Rising, raise questions about her commitment to taking down the very financial firms that have fueled much of her family's success in the years since Bill Clinton left the White House.

Hillary Clinton talks economics at New School in New York City // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton laid out her economic agenda Monday, with a heavy focus on raising middle-class wages after decades of increasing pay inequality.

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy. You can't have one without the other," the Democratic presidential frontrunner declared at the New School in Manhattan.

Clinton's speech was filled with economic proposals that are broadly popular with Democrats as she triangulates between appealing to the centrist voters she'll need to defeat the GOP nominee next year and the populist Democratic base that is coalescing around Bernie Sanders in the primary.

"Wages need to rise to keep up with costs. Paychecks need to grow," she declared. "The defining economic challenge of our time is clear. We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so they can afford a middle-class life."

Hillary Clinton spoke Monday at the New School in New York City.

The speech marks the beginning of a series of policy speeches fleshing out her economic vision.

Clinton ripped Republicans' "trickle down" economic plans, calling instead for a minimum wage increase, guaranteed paid sick and family leave, increased taxes on the wealthy, increasing union strength and reducing health care costs, and making college more affordable.

Uber may become an issue in the US presidential race as Hillary Clinton vows to crack down on worker 'misclassificiation' // Business Insider // Nathan Mcalone – July 13, 2015

The on-demand economy, including the 1099 workers who companies such as Uber rely on, is now an issue in the US presidential race.

Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton weighed in on the topic in a speech on Monday.

In a comment that seems aimed at companies such as Uber, which pays most of its workers as independent contractors instead of employees, she vowed to "crack down on employers who misclassify employees as independent contractors," calling it "wage theft," according to TechCrunch. But she stopped short of naming any companies.

"Fair pay and fair scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days, child care are essential to our competitiveness and growth," Clinton reportedly said. The former secretary of state is the leading candidate in the Democratic field but is facing a challenge from the left in the form of self-described socialist Bernie Sanders.

In her speech, Clinton said the "so-called gig economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation," according to the report. But she countered by saying it was raising tough questions about protections for workers and even the future of the concept of a good job.

The debate over the classification of Uber's workers has raged for months, but little concrete had been decided until last month, when the California labor commission ruled that an Uber driver was an employee, not an independent contractor.

The commission sided with Uber driver Barbara Ann Berwick primarily because it considered Uber to be "involved in every aspect of the operation." Berwick was awarded over $4,000 for her employee expenses.

Berwick has since launched Rideshare School, which promises to teach "drivers from ride-sharing services how to enforce their rights as employees and reclaim funds for driving expenses, overtime, and more." A three-hour class will cost $50.

While Berwick's lawsuit was individual, Uber is also fighting a federal class-action lawsuit that seeks to force Uber to reclassify all its drivers as employees. Uber has argued that the suit should be dropped because the 160,000 drivers referred to have "have little or nothing in common, other than their use of the Uber App in California at

Heckler ejected from Hillary Clinton speech after interrupting to ask about Wall Street regulation // Business Insider // Colin Campbell & Hunter Walker – July 13, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's major economic speech on Monday was interrupted by a protester who demanded answers from her about investment banking regulations.

The heckler, Daniel Burke, stood up and shouted at the end of Clinton's address, in which she outlined her presidential campaign's economic agenda.

"Senator Clinton, will you restore Glass-Steagall?" Burke yelled.

Clinton, who was speaking in Manhattan at The New School, appeared taken aback. She did not answer his question. Her supporters in the audience eventually started clapping to drown out Burke and security escorted him from the building.

Outside, Burke told Business Insider he is an organizer with LaRouche PAC, which supports the controversial political activist Lyndon LaRouche.

The Glass-Steagall Act, which was passed in 1933 and repealed in 1999, separates commercial banks and investment banks. Burke said he supports efforts launched last week by a bipartisan group of senators including Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts) to restore Glass-Steagall. He said this is particularly important because the situation in Greece could fuel another financial crisis.

"It should be passed immediately, preferably in the next two weeks. We really do not know what will come ... of the potential for an immediate financial crash on the basis of the Greek trigger," Burke said.

Clinton has not been clear about her position on Glass-Steagall. Her two Democratic primary rivals, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vermont) have said they support restoring the law.

Burke told Business Insider he is unhappy Clinton did not answer questions at the speech.

"She should take questions so that these things could be raised," he said.

Hillary Clinton just gave a big economic speech // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton is using what her campaign is describing as a "major economic address" Monday morning to call for companies to share more profits with their employees and reforming the nation's tax code.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton promised to change the tax code to encourage companies to expand profit-sharing with their employees in the speech, which she delivered Monday morning at the famously progressive New School in Manhattan.

"We need new ideas. ... One that I believe in and will fight for is profit sharing," Clinton said, according to excerpts of her speech released by her campaign.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," she said. "So I will propose ways to encourage companies to share profits with their employees. That will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets. It's a win-win."

Clinton took shots at three Republican candidates by name: former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, for his much-debated comment last week that people need to "work more hours"; Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, for his fights against public-sector unions; and Sen. Marco Rubio, for his tax-reform plan.

The speech was the first major economic address of Clinton's campaign, and it comes as she is facing a bit of a surge from US Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vermont), who has positioned himself as something of a more progressive alternative to Clinton.

In the speech, she took a subtle shot at the past six-plus years of President Barack Obama's presidency. A Clinton campaign official said prior to the speech that her vision aims to outline how, "after years of economic growth that have not delivered a meaningful rise in middle-class incomes," the country can "grow together."

We'll have more on Clinton's speech as it develops.

Hillary Clinton just called out the economic problem of the next decade // Business Insider // Shane Ferro – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton just brought the most important economic issue of the next decade into the mainstream: the gig economy.

The gig, or on-demand, economy is the new favorite business model coming out of Silicon Valley.

It is relevant to companies such as Uber, which streamlines work for its drivers and takes a cut of their fares but lets them work on their own schedule. It's a little bit like a blend between the regular employment model and the freelancer model.

Whether we like it or not, the gig economy seems to be everywhere. More and more Americans are turning to this semi-freelance way of making a living.

A study from the software company Intuit a few years ago estimated that as much as 40% of the American workforce could be freelancers, independent contractors, or consultants by the year 2020. It's a major, major economic shift.

The New York Times reported that the director of the Freelancers Union, which advocates independent contractors, "puts the scale of the dislocation on a par with that caused by the spread of railroads before and after the Civil War and the boom in the mass production of goods during the early 20th century."

Today's economy isn't set up to deal with this kind of disruption. Policy, so far, has not addressed it. That Clinton addressed the issue in her speech gives the issue a spotlight and legitimacy, the first step forward.

"This on-demand or so-called gig economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protection and what a good job will look like in the future," she said at the New School in Manhattan on Monday.

So, why is the gig economy a problem?

First off, it's expensive for its workers. What independent contractors gain in flexibility, they lose in benefits. Employment taxes are higher, healthcare is more expensive, and 401(k)s (let alone pensions) don't exist for people who freelance. Even if freelancers get paid the same amount as they would at a regular job, they still have a lot less left over to drive the consumer spending that makes up 70% of the American gross domestic product.

We need to be worried about this. Nearly everyone in America outside the top 10% of the income scale has seen incomes fall since 2007.

A recent article by Nick Hanauer and David Rolf in Democracy Journal calls this new kind of economy "an economic transformation that promises new efficiencies and greater flexibility for 'employers' and 'employees' alike, but which threatens to undermine the very foundation upon which middle-class America was built."

Like it or not, addressing the gig economy head on will have to be part of the solution. Monday's speech was a first step. That said, while Clinton raised the issue, she still hasn't laid out a plan for what should be done.

Here are the 3 Republicans that Hillary Clinton took big shots at during her major economic speech //
Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 13, 2015

For one of the first times in her presidential campaign, Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton took direct shots at several of her Republican rivals.

In a sweeping economic policy speech at the New School in New York on Monday, Clinton criticized three Republican presidential candidates including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R), and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida) by name.

It's a sign that she expects to face one of the three in a general-election matchup next year.

Clinton first took a direct shot at Bush over his comments that Americans need to work longer hours to spur economic growth.

"You may have heard Gov. Bush say last week that Americans need to work longer hours. He must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said.

"Let him tell that to the fast food workers marching in the streets for better pay," Clinton said, referencing the push from McDonald's workers for a raise. "They don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

Bush's remarks — which prompted debate over whether they were taken out of context — outlined the governor's ambitious plan to reach 4% growth by helping more part-time workers find full-time employment.

Clinton then moved on to Rubio, claiming that the senator's tax plan includes a major tax $240,000 cut for individuals making over $3 million.

"That's a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy," Clinton said.

The former Secretary of State also went after Walker, who will officially enter the race later on Monday, over the governor's heated battle with Wisconsin's public-sector employee unions.

"Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names by stomping on workers' rights," Clinton said.

The comments came during a major policy speech on economic policy.

The former Secretary of State laid out a number of proposals that she claims will help reduce income inequality, including reigning in the financial industry, raising the minimum wage and increasing training for low-wage workers, reforming the immigration system, and reforming the tax code.

The presumed front runners who Clinton took aim at have each criticized her at length over everything from her tenure as Secretary of State to her current policy proposals.

As The Washington Post's Rebecca Sinderbrand pointed out, before the speech even began, Bush's campaign was attempting to capitalize on the attention. Minutes before the start of the speech, the Bush campaign sent out a fundraising email asking supporters to donate to fund a "Hillary Rapid Response Fund."

Shortly after the speech finished, Bush jabbed Clinton on Twitter.

Hillary Clinton's Economic Intervention Agenda Unveiled // Forbes // Clyde Wayne Crews Jr. – July 13, 2015

In her major New School speech outlining her economic agenda, Hillary Clinton had a lot to say about jobs and higher incomes for Americans, but not much about what matters to those expected to provide them.

Hiring and business startups are suffering, fewer are self employed. Any politician concerned about jobs would first and foremost seek to reduce barriers to employment; to raise employers' willingness to hire.

Yet this is an individual who says "Don't let anybody, don't let anybody tell you that, ah, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs."

The real issue is not "income inequality," but rather that one has to be fairly heroic to be an employer in today's environment of hostility toward capitalism and free enterprise. It is not easy to create jobs for others.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Today the candidate was “proposing an agenda for raising incomes,” but most of it was about more obligations–externally induced higher wages and benefits– for those carrying the weight and doing the hiring in America.

The Washington Post was full of praise on “seven big things” to know about Hillary’s plan. But few ask the key question about these endless flights of interventionist policy fancy, and Clinton is hardly unique in launching them; Will this vision cause business to see hiring new workers as favorable and a smart move, or more of a risk and something to avoid?

Let’s look at some initiatives being touted by Hillary Clinton. She has little private sector business experience, yet wants to “ raise median incomes” (unconcerned that government is an instrument of compulsion, of wealth transfer–not productivity).

Clinton said she’ll “build on” the Affordable Care Act. Notable here is that Obamacare’s employer mandate will activate when individual subsidies–now affirmed by the Supreme Court–kick in. Will that development and her promise to double-down make business more or less likely to hire?

She called for new “public investments,” and estabing an “infrastructure bank” to “ channel public and private funds.” Those were her words; government to channel funds. The government steers and the market only rows, in her view.

We’ve tried the shovel-ready, we’ve tried the trillion-plus stimulus; that didn’t work, yet she persists, calling for broadband “investment” (isn’t that a private industry?) and “cleaner” renewable energy investments (more Solyndra).

One gets the impression many on the left see the private sector as increasingly optional. (In news showing a similar mindset, President Barack Obama just locked up more lands in the west, where even the Post acknowledges the federal government owns over half.)

Clinton supports Obama’s new overtime pay rules. Will that make business more or less likely to expand hiring?

She says another overlooked need is breaking down workforce barriers and labor force participation, “especially for women.” She claims we are leaving talent on the sidelines. Those are legitimate issues, and the complexities and the sociology of it all are immense.

But that intro led to the real pitch: to make mandatory more paid family leave and earned sick pay; or pay for not working, missing the irony of just having talked about workplace participation. Will being required to make accommodations for work not done make business more or less likely to hire employees in the future?

Clinton called for affordable child care; but it’s not clear how the government does that without capturing more private sector resources; and such policies ignore the broader cultural debate that swirls over government assuming the roles of parents.

She touted early learning, another not-cheap program, in the form of “every four year old with access to pre-school.” Clinton claims to want to end the era of “budget brinksmanship” in Washington. But gauging from her speech, that must mean that others must stop arguing with Democrats about spending more money on progressives’ pet social programs.

In discussing income inequality, Clinton invoked the " nurse, teacher, trucker, fast food worker." "They don't need a lecture [which she said Jeb Bush gave them], they need a raise." Clinton proclaims, "So we do have to raise the minimum wage, and implement Obama's new rules on overtime." Then she touted "worker bargaining power" and driving up wages via compulsory union advancement. Will all this make business more or less likely to hire? Will it increase or lessen " inequality"?

Astoundingly, Clinton claimed she said can do all this without burdens on small business — the Jobs Fairy will pay, one presumes.

Clinton did acknowledge red tape, but said nothing about significant relief, via reforms like the "Small Business Regulatory Sunset Act" from Senators Mark Kirk and Steve Daines, among many other regulatory liberalizations. The stances come from different universes, although it was nice to see her credit small business with providing half of jobs.

Clinton will get a lot of attention for encouraging incentives for employer "profit sharing" with workers.

Let it be understood that profit sharing means something different when government mandates or " incentivizes" it, compared to when companies do it of their own accord. Competition has many facets and is extraordinarily complex. Clinton promises more details "in New Hampshire" later. So if you're hearing that, and you're a business looking to direct new earnings and profits to growth, is this promise of intervention going to make you less or more inclined to hire?

Clinton attacks corporations, of which many ordinary individuals are shareholders, despite corporations paying her huge speaking fees, and collecting more money from them than anyone I know. She called for Buffet Rule tax requirements, closing carried interest loopholes. She talked disparagingly about "quarterly capitalism" and business " short-termism"; but she neglected politicians much like herself doing the very same thing in promising wealth transfers and government growth.

She wants to go "beyond Dodd-Frank," extending the already numbingly complex financial law to address the risks in hedge funds, high frequency trading and non-bank entities "which receive little oversight at all." So government has a better record managing finances, she thinks? She mentioned private firms rigging interest rates (no one is opposed to clamping down on fraud), but not the Federal Reserve and its century of manipulation of money and credit, or Dodd-Frank's escalation of too-big-to-fail. To "rein in excessive risk on Wall Street," she, seemingly without irony, wants to "empower new regulators."

In her promise to "crack down" on business and employers, she wants a "trust fund" created out of imposed penalties to " modernize infrastructure." That is an invitation to corruption and trumped up charges against firms. Will this, and all the foregoing, make Wall Street and corporations better or worse at funding the ventures that lead to hiring?

For that matter, will more or fewer corporations even form under policies like those articulated here?

Even the technology frontier is not exempt. Clinton touted technology such as the sharing economy, but then said it "raises questions about workplace protections and what a 'real' job will look like in the future." Will knowing Hillary Clinton will be questioning your new economy business practices make firms more or less likely to hire–or to form in the first place?

The annual federal deficit in the U.S. is projected to head back to the $1 trillion level in a few years, but Clinton seems unconcerned with getting spending under control. Federal regulations are an even bigger problem, creating uncertainty, making hiring a business risk and distorting the path of industries across the board. Clinton seems ready to add to the regulatory enterprise in the name of income inequality–but her interventions would worsen things.

In pursuit of job creation and economic growth, Congress is debating several red tape reforms with elevated but still insufficient focus.

In the wake of its "Waters of the United States" rule, the Environmental Protection Agency just this week issued a 600-page rule on Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Fuel Efficiency Standards for Medium- and Heavy-Duty Engines and Vehicles. Republicans object, but all such are made possible by Congress' perpetual delegation of lawmaking power to agencies.

As I write this, the 2015 Federal Register has topped 40,000 pages, and contains 1,658 rules year-to-date.

Congressional reforms under consideration include automatic sunsetting of rules, versions of a base-closure style regulatory reduction commission (something bi-partisan for a change), and regulatory budgets.

Most worthwhile would be mandatory congressional votes and a presidential signature for the largest of each year's 3,500-plus rules and regulations; that is, treat regulations like normal laws, since they are, after all, laws.

CEI Agenda for Congress -- 114th Congress

With thousands of agency proclamations annually, it was never enough for so-called "significant" or "major" rules to receive White House Office of Management and Budget review. That's the primary foot on the brake, and it's weak.

Meanwhile, regulatory dark matter is gaining ground on the readily observable. Congress needs to scrutinize all agency decrees that affect the public, not just official rules.

"Sub rosa" regulation has been an issue for decades. In 1989′s Regulation and the Reagan Era: Politics, Bureaucracy and the Public Interest, Robert A Rogowski explained:

Regulatory bureaucracies are able to accomplish their goals outside the realm of formal rulemaking….An impressive underground regulatory infrastructure thrives on investigations, inquiries, threatened legal actions, and negotiated settlements. … Many of the most questionable regulatory actions are imposed in this way, most of which escape the scrutiny of the public, Congress, and even the regulatory watchdogs in the executive branch.

Even if formal notice and comment and OMB rule review were optimized, they can never suffice. "Undocumented regulation" like presidential and agency memoranda, guidance documents, bulletins, notices and press releases may enact policy with legal effect. Rule interpretations may be expressed by agencies, and regulated parties pressured to comply, without an actual formal regulation or an appreciation of costs.

Such proclamations obviously skirt the constitutional lawmaking process, but evade even the lesser published notice-and-comment requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) and subsequent OMB review.

A July 2012 U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Oversight and Government Reform expressed concern over guidance documents ("non-legislative" rules), but three years have passed and nothing was done:

Guidance documents, while not legally binding or technically enforceable, are supposed to be issued only to clarify regulations already on the books. However… they are increasingly used to effect policy changes, and they often are as effective as regulations in changing behavior due to the weight agencies and the courts give them. Accordingly, job creators feel forced to comply.

John Graham and James Broughel propose options such as reinstating a George W. Bush requirement to prepare analysis for guidance documents, explicitly labeling them as nonbinding, and requiring formal notice and comment for significant ones.

Guidance documents are an easy way of getting around oversight, since the APA's requirement of publishing a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM) doesn't apply to "to interpretative rules, general statements of policy, or rules of agency organization, procedure, or practice" (P.L. 79-404. Section 553). Presto!

The APA also allows agencies a so-called "good cause" exemption from the requirement to provide the public with a warning, a notice of upcoming rulemaking. Thus it will be unsurprising to learn that the Government Accountability Office appeared in 2012 to announce:

Agencies did not publish a notice of proposed rulemaking (NPRM), enabling the public to comment on a proposed rule, for about 35 percent of major rules and about 44 percent of nonmajor rules published during 2003 through 2010.

Like agency notice-and-comment rules, sometimes guidance is upheld by courts, sometimes not, when it does more than merely interpret.

Notable examples of guidance include the Federal Trade Commission's guidance on disclosure of paid search engine results, and President Barack Obama's waivers of Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act elements. It seems no one has conducted a systematic study of the total quantity of agency guidance but it may be that guidance document volume dwarfs that of rulemaking (Raso 2010), which may not be surprising when no one can even say with authority how many agencies exist.

As noted above, this is not new: A 1992 Duke Law Journal article noted that "Federal Aviation Administration rules are two inches thick while corresponding guidance totals forty feet; similarly, IRS rules consume a foot of space while supporting guidance documents total over twenty feet." It is hard to argue against the conclusion by Mary Whisner that "the body of guidance documents (or nonlegislative rules) is growing, both in volume and in importance."

All potentially significant decrees by agencies need scrutiny, not just "rules." It is most assuredly the case that agencies will attempt to strategically adapt to the new scrutiny and skirt review, by such means as informal provision of information to a regulated party regarding an agency expectations, as Stuart Shapiro has explained. ("Nice business you got there, shame if something were to happen to it.") But a highly engaged executive and Congress can draw attention to and highlight regulatory dark matter and sub-rosa regulatory activity.

New administrative constraints could lead to many unforeseen measures by agencies to escape oversight, effectiveness of which could depend "significantly on how easy it is for OIRA [OMB's Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs] to detect avoidance, and for OIRA, the courts, and others to respond" (Mendelson, Nina A. and Wiener 2014). Agencies can also raise the costs of presidential review of what they do, "self-insulating" their decisions with "variations in policymaking form, cost-benefit analysis quality, timing strategies, and institutional coalition-building (Nou 2013)."

It will become increasingly clear that the delegation of legislative power from the elected to the unelected is at the root of many of these concerns, so answers exist.

Hillary Clinton vows to give workers a raise // Fortune // Tory Newmyer – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton just started the drumbeat that she aims to sustain her presidential bid and, as she framed it, her presidency itself: Working Americans need a raise. In the first major economic policy speech of her campaign, the Democratic front-runner called out a recovery that's distributed too many of its gains to the wealthiest and promised to be a hands-on agent ensuring more profits from Wall Street and beyond end up in the pockets of employees.

"The defining economic challenge of our time is clear. We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middleclass life," Clinton told a morning crowd at New York City's New School, a liberal university and think tank. "We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country. And that will be my mission from the first day I'm president to the last."

To get that done, Clinton proposed a mix of stand-by Democratic policies — raising the minimum wage, making childcare more affordable, and ending tax breaks for financiers, to name a few — plans she acknowledged as "time-tested and more than a little battle-scarred." But she also pledged to confront corporate short-termism, a phenomenon she said is sapping investments in research, infrastructure and training while concentrating returns among the super wealthy.

Clinton used the speech to tip her hat to the presidencies of her husband and the current officeholder, whom she served for four years as Secretary of State, saying both Bill Clinton and Barack Obama "had to come in and clean up the mess left behind" by Republicans. Yet as she sustains Republican attacks that her connections to both mean her candidacy offers little more than a warmed-over throwback, Clinton suggested her presidency would turn a page. She presented as an empathetic grandma, drawing at one point on a conversation with a nurse during her granddaughter's birth that underlined the importance of family leave protections. And she blended that with a brand of technocratic populism she's been honing on the campaign trail, as she seeks to convince a restive liberal base she's attuned to their demands without aping the more acid-tipped barbs of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, her closest-running rival for the Democratic nod.

Clinton reserved her toughest talk for the financial industry. In a subtle swipe at her former boss, she declared it wrong that Wall Street executives have escaped prosecution even when their firms have admitted to crimes, "and on my watch, it will change," she said. Funds recovered from penalties on both firms and individuals should pay for new investments in infrastructure — or be returned directly to taxpayers, she said. And despite the post-crisis reforms tackling Too Big To Fail institutions, Clinton said too many major financial firms still pose systemic risks, suggesting she'd apply a litmus test to ensure the regulators she appoints agree. And she vowed to subject firms operating in the shadow banking system to new regulatory scrutiny, as well. But she was short on specifics — a fact highlighted by a heckler who tried to interrupt to demand whether she would restore the prohibition on securities trading by commercial banks that her husband removed (Clinton ignored him).

Clinton said she will flesh out the policy proposals she previewed in a series of speeches over the coming weeks. The first of those comes Thursday in New Hampshire, where the candidate will detail her plan to incentivize corporate profit sharing with employees. "Studies show that profit sharing that give everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees pockets. It's a win-win," she said.

Clinton was more measured in her comments about the new behemoths of the sharing economy. In a glancing reference to Silicon Valley darlings like Airbnb, Uber and Lyft, she said "the so-called gig economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation. But its also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future." And she briefly appeared to return to the fledgling sector later, promising to "crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors," an issue recently dogging Uber, in particular.

Though the policy proposals she associated with it remain meager for now, perhaps the most provocative portion of Clinton's address dealt with what she framed as the scourge of short-termism, an affliction challenging the capitalist system itself. "In recent years, some of our biggest companies have spent more than half their earnings to buy back their own stock and another third or more to pay dividends," she said. "That doesn't leave a lot left to raise pay or invest in the workers who made those profits possible or to make new investments necessary to ensure a company's future success." She said she's heard concern about the trend from business leaders themselves, who are eager "to embrace their responsibilities, not just to today's share price, but to workers, communities, and ultimately to our country, and, indeed, our planet." But she signaled she'll favor a carrot rather than a stick to address it, proposing a $1,500 tax credit for each new worker trained and hired and tweaks to capital gains taxes, to be named later, to encourage longer-term investments.

Teasing the speech over the weekend, Clinton's campaign released a list of the economic brains who helped shape it. The roster — heavy with liberal stalwarts including Christina Romer, Obama's first chair of the Council of Economic Advisers; Jared Bernstein, formerly Vice President Joe Biden's chief economist; Neera Tanden, who runs the Center for American Progress; and Joseph Stiglitz, a Columbia University economist — itself testifies to Clinton's conscious move to the left.

12 Progressive Promises From Hillary Clinton's Economic Speech // Rolling Stone // Tim Dickinson – July 13, 2015

In an address that lurched wildly between Elizabeth Warren-style populism and a more familiar corporate centrism, Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton unveiled a framework of her economic platform in at the New School in Manhattan on Monday.

Taking the fight to Republicans, Hillary threw punches at a trio of GOP candidates: Scott Walker, for "stomping on workers' rights"; Jeb Bush, for his out-of-touch suggestion that Americans need to work more hours — "he must not have met very many American workers"; and Marco Rubio, for a tax plan she scoffed is a "budget-busting give-away to the super-wealthy."

By contrast, Clinton offered an economic plan she called "principled and pragmatic and progressive" — with a central promise to grow the economy and the wages of average Americans.

Despite at times soaring progressive rhetoric — "hard working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they help produce" — much of what Clinton proposed sounded like it was written by Bob Dole's economic team, including her promise to "push for broader business tax reform to spur investment in America."

Clinton repeatedly banged the drum of deregulation — for the little guy. She promised to roll back Dodd Frank restrictions on smaller lenders, or as she put it to "ease burdens on community banks." And she vowed to be "the small business president" offering to slash taxes for job creators, specifically pledging to "empower entrepreneurs with less red tape, easier access to capital, tax relief and simplification."

But Clinton didn't leave the Democratic base out in the cold. Many of her most specific policy proposals are unmistakably progressive.

Here we survey the 12 leftiest economic promises Clinton made:

1. "We have to raise the minimum wage and implement President Obama's new rules on overtime."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. "I'll crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors."

3. "Let's establish an infrastructure bank that can channel more public and private funds, channel those funds to finance world-class airports, railways, roads, bridges and ports."

4. "I'm committed to seeing every 4-year-old in America have access to high-quality preschool in the next ten years."

5. "I support the Buffett Rule, which makes sure that millionaires don't pay lower rates than their secretaries."

6. "I have also called for closing the carried interest loophole, which lets wealthy financiers pay an artificially low rate."

7. "When the government recovers money from corporations or individuals for harming the public, it should go into a separate trust fund to benefit the public. It, could for example, help modernize infrastructure or even be returned directly to taxpayers."

8. "I've proposed a new $1,500 apprenticeship tax credit for every worker [businesses] train and hire."

9. "I've called for reviving the New Markets Tax Credit and Empowerment Zones to create greater incentives to invest in poor and remote areas."

10. "I will soon be proposing a new plan to reform capital gains taxes to reward longer-term investments that create jobs more than just quick trades."

11. "I will offer plans to rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and ensure that stock markets work for everyday investors, not just high frequency traders and those with the best – or fastest – connections."

12. "Another engine of strong growth should be comprehensive immigration reform....Bringing millions of hard-working people into the formal economy would increase our gross domestic product by an estimated $700 billion over ten years."

Hillary Clinton Tells Progressives: Trust Me, Trust Me, Trust Me // Gawker // Hamilton Nolan – July 13, 2015

Today, Hillary Clinton gave her first major speech on her economic policy. “Blah blah working families,” she said. What did she really say?

Talk is cheap. This speech was amply hyped as Hillary’s big, progressive statement—one that would establish once and for all that she is liberal enough (and fiery enough) to be an acceptable choice for the Democratic party’s left wing, which has spent the past several years appropriately raging over America’s growing economic inequality. This speech, in other words, was Hillary’s chance to convince the Bernie Sanders demographic that she, too, can be their champion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anyone who wants to call themself a progressive in this country today must grasp how entrenched, pervasive, and harmful our inequality is. The worst since the Great Depression. A simple plan for addressing this issue should include things like, A) Higher taxes on the very wealthy, including estate taxes and capital gains taxes; B) Addressing systemic concentration of power in "too big to fail" institutions; C) Raising wages for low-income workers by a significant amount; and D) Expanding and strengthening the government programs that constitute the social safety net. Just to begin with! Patter about "growing the economy" and "creating jobs" "strengthening small businesses" is meaningless campaign rhetoric mouthed by Democrats and Republicans alike. What we really need to know is, does Hillary Clinton actually have any proposals that might resemble something so gauche as an ideal?

Once you scroll past the large amount of "I care about you, the average worker" filler, the answer is: meh. Here are the things that could be construed as real progressive economic proposals by Hillary Clinton (Subject to change by 2016):

I'll also push for broader business tax reform to spur investment in America, closing those loopholes that reward companies for sending jobs and profits overseas.

Promising, but desperately vague.

You know, when we get Americans moving, we get our country moving. So let's establish an infrastructure bank that can channel more public and private funds…channel those funds to finance world-class airports, railways, roads, bridges and ports.

A new WPA? Perhaps? Who can tell?

Fair pay and fair scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days, childcare are essential to our competitiveness and our growth. And we can do this in a way that doesn't impose unfair burdens on businesses, especially small businesses.

Promising, but desperately vague.

So, we do have to raise the minimum wage, and implement President Obama's new rules on overtime, and then we have to go further. I will crack down on bosses who exploit employees by mis- classifying them as contractors or even steal their wages.

Raise the minimum wage by how much? Hillary Clinton does not say. And she certainly does not say "I support the ongoing effort to raise the national minimum wage to $15 an hour." And the "crack down" she offers here amounts to saying, "I will enforce current law."

First, hard-working families need and deserve tax relief and simplification. Second, those at the top have to pay their fair share. That's why I support the Buffet Rule, which makes sure millionaires do not pay lower rates than their secretaries. I have called for closing the carried interest loophole, that lets wealthy financiers pay an artificially low rate.

Piss poor and lacking in specifics. The Buffet Rule is rather weak sauce for a "progressive." Closing the carried interest loophole, which would make a relative handful of fantastically wealthy money managers pay more, is good; raising the capital gains tax rate, which would compel millions of investors to pay a fair tax rate, would be much better.

[Evidence] shows that the decline of unions may be responsible for a third of the increase of inequality among men, so if we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting union workers.

Promising, but desperately vague.

Over the course of this campaign, I will offer plans to rein in excessive risks on Wall Street and ensure that stock markets work for everyday investors, not just high-frequency traders and those with the best or fastest connections. I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that too big to fail is still too big a problem. We will ensure that no firm is too complex to manage or oversee. And we will also process individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or other criminal wrongdoing.

Promising, but desperately vague.

The rest of the speech was feel-good pap.

In essence, Hillary Clinton is asking America's progressives to trust her. She is offering sentiment without specifics. For the voting bloc that does not have enough money to make campaign donations large enough to whisper in Hillary Clinton's ear, that is not going to be enough.

Hillary Clinton vows crackdown on Wall Street risk-taking // Financial Times // Megan Murphy – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to rein in risk-taking on Wall Street and to jail executives found guilty of financial crimes, in a wide-ranging speech that laid out a progressive agenda for boosting growth and wages that will form the centrepiece of her 2016 presidential campaign.

Spelling out her vision of "Hillarynomics" at the New School in New York, the Democratic frontrunner labelled raising the incomes of hard-working Americans "the defining economic challenge of our time."

In setting out a list of policy items to fuel stronger, more sustainable economic growth, Mrs Clinton touched on many of the themes she has already discussed on the campaign trail, including boosting women's participation in the labour force, encouraging companies to share their profits with employees and prioritising early childhood education.

She singled out Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, and several other potential Republican rivals for touting policies she said have been shown to entrench economic inequality, such as reducing taxes for the wealthy.

However, it was her promise to crack down on excessive risk in the financial system, including across the so-called "shadow banking" sector, and to appoint regulators that would take a tougher approach to executives accused of criminal activity, that will probably energise the party's progressive wing, and cause minor tremors on Wall Street.

"Stories of misconduct by individuals and institutions in the financial industry are shocking," Mrs Clinton said. "HSBC allowing drug cartels to launder money. Five major banks pleading guilty to felony charges for conspiring to manipulate currency exchange and interest rates. There can be no justification or tolerance for this kind of criminal behaviour."

Mrs Clinton, who has faced criticism for accepting hefty speaking fees and financial support for her campaign from banks and hedge funds, said that legislators may need to "go beyond' the Dodd-Frank financial reforms she accused Republicans of trying to unravel.

"Too big to fail is still too big a problem," the former secretary of state said. "Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky."

After a rocky start to her campaign, Mrs Clinton is hoping to draw a line under a series of controversies and to refocus coverage on her message to middle-class families. Facing a stronger-than-expected early challenge from

Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator and self-described socialist who has emerged as a favourite among the Democratic party's liberal wing, aides have been keen to stress Mrs Clinton's commitment to progressive ideals and her lengthy record on issues such as equal pay for women.

While Monday's speech was light on specific policy detail, Mrs Clinton said she would introduce proposals for overhauling the way capital gains are taxed to incentivise job creation, increasing public-private investment and encouraging companies to reward their employees more fairly.

"We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country," she said. "That will be my mission from the first day I'm president to the last."

In a nod to the bitter battle her party recently waged against President Barack Obama over his efforts to secure the authority to close the largest trade deal of a generation, Mrs Clinton said officials needed to set a "high bar" for trade agreements.

She reaffirmed her opposition to the so-called "carried interest" loophole that allows private equity fund managers to pay a lower rate of tax on their earnings. And she suggested that she would look for new ways to end tax inversions, where US companies shift their domiciles abroad to take advantage of lower tax rates.

She also lambasted a corporate culture she said was too focused on immediate profit-taking and quarterly earnings reports instead of long-term growth.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," she said.

Millennial Shock: Hillary to Attack Uber, AirBnB, 'Sharing Economy' // Breitbart // Joel Pollack – July 13, 2015

In a speech laying out her economic policy, Hillary Clinton is set to attack companies like Uber and Airbnb in the "sharing economy" or "contractor economy," arguing that such companies undercut wages. Her proposed alternative is to use government regulations to guide economic activity. Previews of her speech have set off alarm bells in Silicon Valley, and are sure to surprise millennial consumers, whose loyalty to the Democratic Party has has largely been blind, and who have presumed that the party of government shared their love for technology.

Politico's Michael Grunwald delivered the preview of Clinton's approach to the sharing economy:

Clinton's aide said she will discuss some of the structural forces conspiring against sustainable wage growth, such as globalization, automation, and even consumer-friendly "sharing economy" firms like Uber and Airbnb that are creating new relationships between management and labor (and which now employ many Obama administration alumni). But she will argue that policy choices have contributed to the problem, and that she can fix it.

Josh Constine of TechCrunch sighed: "As if Uber needed more enemies." And John Kartch of Forbes wrote:

Because her transportation is always taken care of, perhaps Clinton has never bothered to talk to an Uber or Lyft driver and therefore doesn't understand that a flexible schedule is a top draw. Drivers take great pride in being their own boss. Making their own schedule allows drivers to balance family and work obligations. Drivers can take time to see their kid's Little League game, visit the doctor, get groceries or go to a job interview.

Clinton's expected assault on the sharing economy confirms that Big Labor is still the dominant force in left-wing politics. Democrats have targeted Uber and Airbnb with new regulations designed to protect entrenched monopolies, despite the value the new companies create for their customers.

The sharing economy has also lowered the cost of living for millennials who still crowd into Democrat-run cities. Attacking it means attacking them. Clinton's approach therefore creates an opportunity for her Republican rivals to reach the elusive millennial vote.

As Breitbart News noted recently:

The entire "sharing" economy, which is at the heart of the new tech boom, is in danger. "Millennials" in their 20s and 30s, who rely on the new social networks to fulfill their basic needs–or to pay the rent–are suddenly realizing that government is something other than "the name we give to the things we choose to do together," as former U.S. Rep. Barney Frank said. On the contrary, government is often the name we give to what one group of people does to another group by force of law.

In this case, the groups with their hands on the levers of power are special interests–especially unions–to which, ironically, millennials are aligned through their common support for the Democratic Party. Now, tech-savvy voters are rubbing their eyes and wondering how it is that the party that promised to reinvent government is, in fact, using government in the most old-fashioned of ways, destroying innovation and competition to protect the politically-connected donors who run things....

The crisis of the sharing economy has created a unique window of opportunity for conservative leaders to reach out to the millennial generation, which doesn't know who it can trust anymore....Are there presidential candidates who can explain how the best of what is new can be reconciled with the best of what is old? And are there enough millennials yet ready to listen–to "disrupt" themselves?

In Economic Address, Hillary Clinton Threads the Needle // Newsweek // Taylor Wofford – July 13, 2015

Vowing to fight for "hard-working families" instead of "successful CEOs and money managers," Hillary Clinton delivered the first major economic address of her campaign Monday, offering a glimpse at policies she plans to flesh out in coming weeks and hoping that her agenda will turn back any threat posed by Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont.

The venue for the speech was no accident. The New School in Manhattan has been a citadel of progressive thought since the early 20th century. The talk was the first of several policy addresses that the Democratic front-runner plans to deliver in coming weeks, according to her campaign.

Clinton focused on jobs, growth and income inequality. The former New York senator began by blasting "trickle-down economics"—the term Democrats have used for Republican economic policies since Ronald Reagan was in the White House.

"For 35 years, Republicans have argued that if we give more wealth to those at the top, by cutting their taxes and letting big corporations write their own rules, it will trickle down. It will trickle down to everyone else," she said, decrying the high deficits and untoward concentrations of wealth that have been incurred during Republican turns in the White House.

Clinton offered a peek at economic policies that she plans to detail in coming weeks, including tackling the economic threat posed by loose regulation of the so-called shadow banking system, which includes hedge funds and high-frequency traders. She also advocated increased profit-sharing at corporations that would allow workers to benefit from record-high profits. The former secretary of state also took aim at tax rates on capital gains, urging a distinction between short-term and long-term gains and vowing to work for tax reform that encourages long-term investments and diminishes speculation.

While Clinton is feeling pressure from Sanders, the independent candidate who is challenging her for the Democratic nomination, she took shots at Republicans, including former Florida Governor Jeb Bush. "You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. Well, he must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said.

(At a campaign event in New Hampshire last week, Bush made comments suggesting that in order to meet his ambitious goal of 4 percent annual growth, Americans would need to put in longer hours. The Republican front-runner's campaign clarified his remark, saying that it was aimed at underemployed Americans who are seeking more work and can't find it.)

Still, Clinton wasn't accepting any qualification of Bush's remarks. American workers, Clinton said, "don't need a lecture—they need a raise." She also took aim at Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker on the day of his formal entry into the presidential race, chiding his successful efforts to limit the bargaining power of public employee unions.

Clinton also stressed the role women have to play in growing the economy. "The United States used to rank seventh out of 24 advanced countries in women's labor force participation. By 2013, we had dropped to 19th. That represents a lot of unused potential for our economy and for American families," she said. (Sanders rarely makes gender distinctions when he makes his economic pitch.)

Paid family leave, earned sick days and child care are "essential to our competitiveness," she added.

The closest Clinton came to disagreeing with Sanders, a self-proclaimed democratic socialist, was when she described her policies as "clear-eyed capitalism."

Sanders responded to Clinton's speech by reiterating his proposals, including investing $1 trillion in infrastructure, raising the federal minimum wage to $15 and breaking up the largest banks, a step Clinton avoided proposing even as she allowed that financial institutions that are "too big to fail" still represent a threat to the economy and promised to appoint tough regulators.

Hillary Clinton: 'Mission' to boost middle-class incomes // Newsday // David Schwartz & Laura Figueroa – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton, in her first major economic address of the 2016 presidential campaign, said Monday she will make it her "mission" to raise incomes for middle class Americans.

"We must raise income for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middle-class life," Clinton said in a speech at the New School in Manhattan.

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," Clinton said. "You can't have one with out the other."

Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, was expected to emphasize policies that would focus on the middle class. Other Democratic primary opponents, including Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, have appealed to the Democratic base by criticizing rising income equality.

Her campaign said the speech would outline proposals "for an economy that grows faster, fairer and more sustainably so that everyday Americans can get ahead and stay ahead."

Republicans on Sunday criticized her positions as traditional "big government" proposals that would exacerbate the income divide.

"Bigger government creates crony capitalism," Carly Fiorina, a former chief executive at Hewlett-Packard, said on ABC's "This Week." Fiorina said the current tax code, for example, benefitted large corporations over small businesses.

Clinton last month announced her candidacy on Roosevelt Island, invoking the legacy of Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt and highlighting economic prosperity, to launch a new phase of her presidential campaign. Since then, Sanders has attracted large crowds in early primary and caucus voting states.

Salon // Simon Maloy – July 13, 2015

This morning Hillary Clinton will deliver her first big economic policy speech of the 2016 campaign, and all indications are that she will embrace full communism. Hillary's strong position in the polls notwithstanding, she still has to keep an eye on two Democratic rivals making plays for the restive liberal base of the party: Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley. Sanders has amassed an impressive share of the Democratic electorate by running hard to the left on economic issues: single-payer healthcare, expanding Social Security, breaking up big banks, etc. O'Malley doesn't have anywhere near the support that Sanders does, but he's cranking out white papers on topics like climate change and bank regulation that are laying down markers for the 2016 policy fight.

And so with two competitors running hard to the left, Hillary wants to grab herself a slice of that liberal enthusiasm. Her big speech "kicking off" her campaign last month laid out some of the broad economic themes she'll run on: higher wages, reducing economic inequality, clean energy and so forth. The speech today will put a tiny bit of policy meat on those bones. Hillary's advisers gave a preview of what she'll propose to the New York Times:

Her most ambitious ideas, which her advisers say are designed to help families, include prekindergarten for all 4-year-olds, expanded access to child care, paid sick days and paid family leave, helping to make college students "as debt free as possible," a higher minimum wage, company profit-sharing for employees, legal protections for people in country illegally, and more financing for medical research.

Universal prekindergarten alone could cost tens of billions of dollars over the next decade, according to outside advisers to Mrs. Clinton.

As the last sentence of that block quote indicates, Hillary's policy platform is already being framed in terms of cost to the taxpayer – the lede of the Times article characterizes her agenda as "muscular federal policies that would require hundreds of billions of dollars in new spending and markedly expand Washington's influence in a host of areas." And, of course, when a Democrat proposes an expansion of federal programs to aid the poor and working class, there's a quick assumption that the increase in spending will be controversial and a ripe target for attack by Republicans. Again, from the Times:

The question is whether the lofty vision she is articulating as a candidate for the Democratic nomination is one that can be turned into a mandate if she is elected president.

"The problem for Hillary is that the country itself isn't hungering for liberalism," said Jeremy Mayer, an associate professor of politics at George Mason University. "Republicans will be well positioned to say to Hillary, 'Great, and how are you going to pay for that?'"

This is so frustrating. I don't know if Hillary is going to use the speech to get into the funding mechanisms for all these programs, though I assume it involves some combination of raising taxes on rich people, closing various loopholes, and eliminating some deductions. But why should we automatically assume that Republicans will have the better of her when it comes to spending?

A quick perusal of the tax plans put forth by some of the GOP candidates shows that they don't really have too much credibility to criticize the (as yet unknown) price tag of Hillary's policy proposals. Rand Paul's tax plan, which calls for a complete elimination of our current progressive tax structure in favor of a 14.5 percent flat tax, would cost the government a gobsmacking $15 trillion in revenue over its first decade, according to Citizens for Tax Justice. Even when you goose the numbers with a hefty dose of dynamic scoring, as the right-leaning Tax Foundation did, the Paul plan still ends up costing nearly $1 trillion over ten years. Marco Rubio's tax plan, which combines massive tax cuts for the rich with an expansion of the child tax credit, would cost $4 trillion over the same time period, and "even if you assume that the plan results in a large amount of economic growth and thus a reflow of revenue from the large economy, the plan will still increase the debt by 8 percent in the next decade." Rubio also wants to vastly expand the military budget at the same time that he's starving the government of revenue.

These are common themes among most of the Republican candidates – slash tax revenues dramatically while boosting funding for the military, all the while promising to make up the gargantuan costs with unspecified cuts elsewhere in the budget. A candidate whose tax policy calls for an unpaid-for, multitrillion-dollar giveaway to America's wealthy can't also claim the mantle of fiscal responsibility to attack a Democrat's proposed expansion of social programs. But just as we're conditioned to treat wildly irresponsible Republican and conservative tax plans as the norm, we seem to reflexively grant Republicans an edge when it comes to issues of government spending. I look forward to hearing what Hillary has in mind, and I hope she does explain how she'll pay for what she's proposing. But let's not presume that she's already put herself at a political disadvantage.

The Best Quotes From Hillary Clinton's Speech That Outlined Her Seriously Feminist Economic Vision // Bustle // Josephine Yurcaba – July 13, 2015

In a speech Monday morning, 2016 presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton outlined her goals for the American economy. Clinton spoke at the New School in New York City about her vision, which includes raising median incomes, using policy to raise wages and reduce income inequality, and working, specifically, to raise pay for women across the U.S., according to the Washington Post. Some of the best quotes from Clinton's speech on the economy show that she understands the fundamental connection between economic disparities and social inequalities, which good policy can help change.

"I've had the opportunity to listen to Americans' concerns about an economy that still isn't delivering for them the way it should," Clinton said when she started the speech, according to her Twitter account. She talked about how Americans are working harder — they're working longer hours and producing more for their employers — but their wages aren't going up.

Clinton also pointed out that Republican policies are consistently the same, and they only help to worsen income inequality: Republicans want to cut taxes for the rich, loosen regulations on financial industries, break up unions and other organizations that provide protections for workers, and restrict public investments, according to her Twitter. Clinton said those policies have failed, and it's time to try something brand new — like raising the minimum wage, for starters.

Clinton: Why training for the new economy is key // Wired // Issie Lapowsky – July 13, 2015

Following similar comments made by President Obama, Hillary Clinton says that in order to ensure technology is creating jobs—and not displacing them—the country needs more training programs that can funnel low-income Americans into the tech-driven workforce.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In an age of technological change, we need to provide pathways to get skills and credentials for new occupations and create online platforms to connect workers to jobs," she said in a speech on economic policy in New York City today. "There are exciting efforts underway, and I want to support and scale the ones that show results."

Those programs will be critical to lowering the youth unemployment rate, she said, in which some 6 million Americans between 16 and 24 years old are neither currently working nor in school. That unemployment rate is especially high among young black and Hispanic people. Training plays a role in helping people secure those jobs, but Clinton said we must also ensure that even as technology eliminates the need for some jobs, there are enough new ones to take their place.

"The best antipoverty program is a job, but that's hard to say if there aren't enough jobs for people to help lift themselves out of poverty," Clinton said.

To increase the number of available jobs, the former Secretary of State laid out a plan to offer businesses $1,500 in tax credits for every employee they hire and train.

Hillary Clinton Will Crack Down On Contractor Economy // Wired // Issie Lopowsky – July 13, 2015

ADD HILLARY CLINTON to the list of labor advocates coming after the gig economy.

In her first major speech outlining her economic platform today at New York City's New School, the Democratic presidential candidate vowed to crack down on "bosses misclassifying workers as contractors." The promise seemed to come in direct response to the wave of legal action that's been taken against companies like Uber recently, which argue that drivers should be compensated as employees.

Clinton, who emphasized the need to raise wages throughout her speech, said that businesses that allow people to make extra money by renting a spare room or driving their own car can often threaten solid labor practices. "This on demand or so-called gig economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation," she said, "but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protection and what a good job will look like in the future."

Hillary Clinton Says On-Demand Economy Raises Hard Questions About Workplace Protections // TechCrunch // Josh Constine – July 13, 2015

"This on-demand, or so-called 'gig economy', is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation. But it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future" Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said in a speech today outlining her economic policy. You can rewatch the talk on C-Span here.

Clinton was referring to companies like Uber that are built on armies of independent contractors. She prefaced the statement noting that the country and Wall Street are thinking too much about short-term financial returns. She said "Meanwhile, many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing websites, selling products they design themselves at home, or even driving their own car."

Clinton SpeechWhile these workers get scheduling flexibility and the freedom to do other jobs, they don't get benefits and may not have the same long-term career opportunities. Some prefer being their own boss, but some want the extra protection of full-time positions. There may be an opportunity for policies that give workers themselves the choice.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the talk at The New School in Manhattan, Clinton laid out her plan to strengthen wages and build up the middle class. Her stance on contract workers came as part of her push to foster good paying jobs. That's one part of her three-pronged strategy that also includes balancing out inequality and a focus on long-term over short-term thinking for businesses.

Clinton accused some employers of "wage theft" through the way they treat contractors. She says "I'll crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages." Clinton cited "Fair pay and fair scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days, child care are essential to our competitiveness and growth." These are the workplace protections that contractors lack.

However, her camp tells me Clinton sees this issue as having arisen well before the on-demand economy, and she views a crack down of enforcement as a distinct issue. Specifically, her campaign says that Clinton has not made a definitive statement about how Uber drivers should be classified, and I was told not to expect one soon. Instead, Clinton is thinking strategically about how to develop policies that protect all types of workers but that are relevant to the future and don't stifle innovation.

Also relevant to the tech sector, Clinton denounced quarterly capitalism. Speaking on behalf of business leaders she's spoken to, Clinton said "They say everything's focused on the next earnings report or the short-term share price. The result is too little attention on the sources of long-term growth: research and development, physical capital, and talent.

"Some of our biggest companies have spent almost half their earnings to buy back their own stock, and another third or more to pay dividends. That doesn't leave a lot left to raise pay or invest in the workers or make new investments to ensure a company's future success" Clinton said. "These trends need to change."

The question now is what concrete changes Clinton would like to see regarding contractor classifications, workplace protections, and reporting requirements for public companies to build what she calls "a growth and fairness economy."

Hillary Clinton takes aim at Uber economy in speech // Market Watch // Robert Schroeder – July 13, 2015

Uber was the elephant in the room when Hillary Clinton gave her economic-policy speech on Monday, as the Democrats' leading presidential contender called out the "gig economy."

In a major campaign speech in New York City, the former secretary of state didn't mention the ride-sharing service by name. But it was pretty clear what sort of companies she was talking about when she got to how some Americans earn money.

"Many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing websites, selling products they design themselves at home, or even driving their own car," she said at the New School.

But that sort of work comes with its own problems, she said.

"This 'on demand' or so-called 'gig economy' is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future," Clinton added.

As Mashable notes, her remarks came as startups like Uber and its competitor Lyft are under mounting scrutiny for classifying drivers as independent contractors rather than part-time or full-time employees, entitled to health-

Hillary Clinton tackles Republican rivals head-on in economic speech // Guardian // Sabrina Siddiqui – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to fight for higher wages and lift the American middle class on Monday, in a speech that outlined her economic agenda and saw the Democratic presidential candidate take a more aggressive tone towards her Republican rivals.

Speaking at the New School in Greenwich Village, a New York university known for its progressive worldview, Clinton placed income inequality and improving the conditions of everyday Americans at the heart of her pitch to grow the economy and increase wages.

“I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy,” she said. “You can’t have one without the other.

“We must raise incomes for hard-working Americans so they can afford a middle-class life. We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country. That will be my mission from the first day I’m president to the last.”

To alleviate the financial burden on middle-class Americans, Clinton emphasized policies such as paid family leave, lowering childcare costs, passing equal pay for women and raising the minimum wage.

Signalling a willingness to play offense against Republicans, she called out three Republican candidates who are seen as the leaders in a crowded presidential field: Jeb Bush, on workers, Marco Rubio, on taxes, and Scott Walker on unions.

Invoking Bush’s recent comments that Americans need to “work longer hours” – a clumsy statement that drew immediate scrutiny from Democrats and the media – Clinton sought to portray the former Florida governor as out of touch.

“Well, he must not have met many American workers,” she said. “They don’t need a lecture, they need a raise.”

Clinton also described a tax plan proposed by Rubio, a senator from Florida, as “a sure, budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy”.

Alex Conant, a spokesman for Rubio, responded to Clinton’s jab by saying the former secretary of state “wants to take us back to yesterday”.

“We cannot raise taxes like the 1990s or increase spending like the 2000s,” Conant said in an email to the Guardian. “Marco is proposing a 21st-century tax plan that would benefit all Americans, especially middle-class families.”

Of Walker, the anti-union Wisconsin governor who formally launched his presidential campaign on Monday, Clinton said she would fight back against the “mean-spirited, misguided attacks” on workers waged by him and other Republican chief executives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on workers’ rights,” Clinton said.

The Bush campaign hit back with a statement that characterized her proposals as “antiquated”.

“Hillary Clinton is proposing the same failed policies we have seen in the Obama economy, where the typical American household’s income has declined and it’s harder for businesses to hire and the middle class to achieve rising incomes,” Allie Brandenburger, a Bush spokeswoman, said in a statement.

“Americans want to work and want the opportunity to achieve earned success for their families, but Secretary Clinton’s antiquated proposals protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity and 21st-century companies like Uber that are creating jobs. Governor Bush believes harnessing innovation and fostering technology can help us grow at 4% once again.”

Clinton’s tough talk was not reserved just for Republicans – sounding ever the progressive, the former first lady also vowed to go after individuals and corporations on Wall Street that run afoul of the law.

“Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky and the problems are not limited to the big banks that get all the headlines,” she said, adding that she would appoint bank regulators who recognized that “too big to fail is still too big a problem”.

“There can be no justification or tolerance,” she said, for criminal behavior, committing to going beyond the 2010 Wall Street reform legislation known as Dodd-Frank.

Clinton faces a primary challenge from Bernie Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont who is running for president as a Democrat and is a vocal critic of Wall Street. Although Clinton struck a firm tone on the financial services industry, she remained measured – citing her role as a former senator from New York to point out that she knows “first-hand the role Wall Street can and should play in the economy”.

Clinton said she would later introduce in more detail her plans to boost the economy and reform the tax code – including a proposal to reform capital gains taxes – to increase the minimum wage, boost infrastructure investment and establish universal preschool.

In conclusion, Clinton added a personal touch to summarize her approach to steering the economy. “Maybe it’s the grandmother in me,” Clinton said, but “leadership is planting trees under whose shade you will never sit.”

Hillary Clinton knows: the real face of low labor force participation is female // Guardian // Jessica Valenti – July 13, 2015

When we think about stay-at-home moms, the most common image is one of cheerful suburban women shuttling kids off to soccer games and packing bag lunches: women who choose to be at home instead of at work. But the truth is far thornier, with many women at home not because they want to be, but because they have to be – something to which Hillary Clinton seemed attuned as she called for more women in the workforce on Monday as part of her economic vision for the future.

Clinton has been pushing left on work-life issues, so it was no surprise that she cited family leave, closing the wage gap and access to affordable, quality childcare as key to a building a stronger economy and narrowing gender inequalities. But Clinton also said she wants more women working in the public sphere, saying: “we can’t afford to leave talent on the sidelines.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She continued: “The United States used to rank seventh out of 24 advanced countries in women’s labor force participation. By 2013, we’d dropped to 19th. That represents a lot of unused potential for our economy and American families.”

To prioritize putting more women in the workforce shouldn’t be controversial. But in a culture that still tells women that the most important job title they’ll ever hold is “mother” – and with Republicans at the ready to skewer anyone who hints at anything but pure reverence for women who stay at home – Clinton’s message is actually quite subversive. By plainly saying that she wants more women at work, the presidential hopeful is taking on the American fantasy that the majority of stay-at-home moms are there by choice.

While some moms who stay home to take care of children may label this decision as a choice, we can’t really call it such when the alternative may be spending an exorbitant amount of money on childcare. The long-held notion that stay-at-home moms are highly educated women who simply “opted out” of high-powered and well-paid careers is largely a myth.

According to a 2014 Pew study, a third of stay-at-home moms live in poverty, and 70% of single stay-at-home moms live below the poverty level. And nearly half of women who stay at home with children have a high school diploma or less. As Bryce Covert wrote last year: “these financial hardships and barriers are likely part of why a growing share of stay-at-home mothers are out of the workforce because they can’t find a job.” (Why it’s always women’s salaries that are considered expendable for the family good is a whole different story.)

It’s not just mothers who are out of work, of course. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, while the labor participation rate of men over 20 years old is about 72%, it’s only 58% for women. The face of unemployed Americans is a distinctly female one.

In her speech, Clinton said: “We should be making it easier for Americans to be both good workers and good parents and caregivers.” Part of doing that is, as Clinton laid out, ensuring equal pay, fair family leave and affordable childcare. But it’s also dismantling the myth that women would largely rather be at home than at work. Yes, we love our children. And many of us moms do want more flexibility and family leave. But we also want to get paid, and we want real choices.

Women are a necessary and vital part of the workforce whose contribution to the public good goes beyond raising children. And as Clinton said, these are not just “women’s issues.” They’re American ones.

Clinton unveils economic plan, calls for corporate profit sharing // USA Today // David Jackson – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton unveiled her economic program Monday, including a call for corporations to share more profits with employees in a bid to increase take-home pay.

“Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce,” Clinton said during an address in New York City.

Higher wages and salaries are keys to revving up the economy, Clinton said, as she outlined plans to generate economic growth, further regulate Wall Street excesses and promote opportunity for more women.

“I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy,” she said at one point. “You can’t have one without the other.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of state, New York senator, and first lady also called out Republican presidential candidates Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Scott Walker while denouncing GOP-style tax-cut “trickle-down” economics that favor the wealthy.

In slamming Bush for his comment that people need to “work more hours” to help the economy grow, Clinton said that the former Florida governor obviously hasn’t spoken to many actual workers. “They don’t need a lecture,” Clinton said. “They need a raise.”

Bush said he was referring to the need for part-time workers to get full-time jobs, an aspiration made more difficult by the kinds of government regulations supported by Clinton and Democrats.

Allie Brandenburger, a Bush spokesperson, said that Clinton “is proposing the same failed policies we have seen” during President Obama’s tenure.

“Secretary Clinton’s antiquated proposals protect the special interests that want to stifle American ingenuity and 21st Century companies like Uber that are creating jobs,” she said.

The Democratic candidate also criticized Walker, the governor of Wisconsin who is kicking off his campaign today, saying he is anti-union. Walker says he acted to protect taxpayers.

Clinton said her economic strategy — including equal pay legislation — will tap the under-utilized contributions of women. She drew perhaps her biggest applause with the line, “it’s way past time to end the outrage of so many women still earning less than men on the job — and women of color making even less.”

A pro-family, pro-growth agenda also includes paid leave, affordable child care, earned sick days, and flexible scheduling, she said.

Clinton also called for more regulations of Wall Street financial practices, saying too many firms continue to abuse the system. She said that “too big to fail is still too big a problem,” and that abusers of the financial system should be criminally prosecuted.

Hillary Clinton Boosts Workers, Blasts Uber // US News // Tim Risen – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton is out to boost labor rights at companies like Uber, a move that may resonate with some voters but could alienate small-business owners.

The leading Democratic presidential contender on Monday took a thinly veiled swipe at Uber, which is facing scrutiny for classifying its drivers as independent contractors instead of employees – a practice Clinton called “wage theft” during a speech at the New School in New York City.

“This ‘on demand’ or so-called ‘gig' economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it’s also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future,” Clinton said, vowing to "crack down on bosses misclassifying workers as contractors.”

Clinton called for businesses to expand many benefits, including "fair pay and fair scheduling, paid family leave and earned sick days," but insisted that it could be done without causing prices to rise too steeply.

"We can do this in a way that doesn't impose unfair burdens on businesses -- especially small businesses," Clinton said of her proposals.

Independent contractors are not eligible for the same benefits or protections as full-time or even part-time employees, which means they often miss out on things like overtime pay or access to health or life insurance. Uber is facing lawsuits from former drivers who seek employee benefits including expense accounts to cover routine costs, like buying gas for the cars they drive for the company.

Uber has "hundreds of thousands of driver partners and millions of riders" but only "more than 3,000 worldwide employees," a spokeswoman for the company tells U.S. News.

Clinton's call for greater employee benefits may resonate with workers at sharing economy sites like Uber, Lyft or food delivery application Postmates. But adding benefits could have adverse effects, forcing businesses to raise prices, cut back services or trim jobs, says Joe Kennedy, a senior fellow at the Information Technology and Innovation Foundation think tank.

"There is political pressure trying to makes sure the company doesn't make too much," Kennedy says. "All that risks the tremendous value the consumer gets." Also at risk: public opinion. "Anything that crimps Uber too much would be opposed by younger voters," Kennedy says.

The global sharing economy, much of which is based in the U.S., is currently worth approximately $15 billion and forecast to be valued at $335 billion by 2025, according to a report from PricewaterhouseCoopers, which listed affordability and convenience as key lures for its growing base of consumers.

Other businesses -- including trucking, construction and cleaning services -- also rely on contractors, says David Rosenfeld, a union counsel at the law firm of Weinberg, Roger and Rosenfeld.

"When you use contractors you don't have to pay taxes on them – you don't have to provide workers compensation, you don't have to worry about discrimination lawsuits, you don't have to worry about union issues, and you don't have to pay overtime," he says. "The disincentive of using contractors is that you lose the right to tell them how to work, how to behave, how to dress. You lose control of your brand that you would have with employees."

Not all companies may react negatively to Clinton's call for more worker benefits, however. Rosenfeld points out that her point of view could even re-energize the union vote among Democrats.

"This will create a split in the business community since there are some who like the model of employment, although there are benefits to using contractors," says Rosenfeld, who is also a lecturer at the University of California-Berkeley School of Law. "If unions get out and get their members and their families to vote it makes a difference. Obama really only paid lip service for unions and didn't rally support the way Hillary Clinton could."

Clinton Proposes 'Fairness' Economy, Swats Republicans // US News // David Catanese – July 13, 2015

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," Clinton said. "The measure of our success must be how much incomes rise for hardworking families, not just CEOs and middle managers."

Among the laundry list of Clinton's bare-boned economic proposals: Closing loopholes rewarding companies that send jobs and profits overseas, encouraging companies to profit-share with their employees, mandating paid leave for parents with newborn children and providing tax credits to companies that train and hire workers.te

She also pledged tax relief for small businesses and capital gains tax reform, and swiped at a plan by Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., without lending details of her own.

Clinton claimed that Rubio would slash rates for those making $3 million, which she categorized as "a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super wealthy."

Rubio wasn't the only Republican on the receiving end of a broadside from Clinton.

She also swatted Jeb Bush for his remark last week in New Hampshire saying Americans should "work longer hours" to help grow the economy.

"He must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said. "Let him say that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day, or the teacher who is in that classroom, or the trucker who drives all night. They don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

Bush, through a spokeswoman, noted that household income has declined through the current presidential administration – which Clinton was a part of – and deemed Clinton's solutions "antiquated proposals ... that want to stifle American ingenuity."

In a nod to the importance of unions, a crucial Democratic Party constituency, Clinton also took on Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is kicking off his presidential campaign Monday.

She accused Walker of making his name by "stomping on workers' rights" with "mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

"If we want to be serious about raising incomes, we have to support unions," she said.

Clinton also rehashed her commitment to policies she's previously advocated for, like a higher minimum wage, equal pay for women in the workplace and comprehensive immigration reform.

"Bringing millions of hardworking people into the formal economy would increase our gross domestic product $700 billion over 10 years," she estimated.

In this Jan. 23, 2014, then-Secretary of State Hillary Rodham testifies on Capitol Hill in Washington before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on the deadly September attack on the U.S. diplomatic mission in Benghazi, Libya, that killed Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans. Senior Obama administration officials, including the White House chief of staff, knew as early as 2009 that Hillary Rodham Clinton was using a private email address for her government correspondence, according to some 3,000 pages of correspondence released by the State Department late Tuesday night, June 20, 2015. But it's unclear whether the officials realized Clinton, now the leading Democratic presidential candidate, was running her email from a server located in her home in Chappaqua, N.Y., a potential security risk and violation of administration policy.

She set a goal of providing high-quality pre-school access to every 4-year-old within a decade.

"Quality affordable childcare is not a luxury, it's a growth strategy," she said.

To address the excesses of Wall Street – an area where liberals continue to be skeptical about Clinton – the former New York senator said she would implement policies to incentivize financial firms to think about long-term growth, rather than "quarterly capitalism."

"We also have to go beyond Dodd-Frank," Clinton said, referring to the financial reforms implemented by President Barack Obama. And she acknowledged that "too big to fail is still too big a problem."

But again, she was light on specifics on how far she was willing to go, simply promising more consequences for leaders of firms who skirt the rules.

In this final section of the speech, a protester began to yell, "Senator Clinton, will you restore Glass-Stegall?"

That's the 1933 banking act that separated commercial and investment banking. It was repealed under her husband's administration in 1999, and critics say the move was partly responsible for the financial meltdown that occurred a decade later.

The crowd cheered as the protester was ejected from the auditorium. Clinton just smiled.

Hillary Clinton takes aim at Jeb Bush, and at America's falling rate of participation in the workforce // Quartz // Tim Fernholz – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton laid out her economic agenda as a battle to raise the incomes of average Americans, and didn't hesitate to slam her Republican rivals for the US presidency—in some cases by name—over their ideas for jumpstarting the economy.

"The measure of success must be how much incomes rise for hard-working families," the former US secretary of state told an audience in New York, "and not some arbitrary growth target untethered to people's lives and livelihoods."

That was a not-so-subtle dig at former Florida governor and Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush, who has said that as president he would make 4% economic growth his target, despite the historical difficulty of achieving that goal:

While Bush has yet to outline his agenda fully, he has said that he wants Americans to work more, despite the fact that they already work quite a bit and that working more hours doesn't solve the US productivity problem. "He must not have met very many American workers," Clinton joked, saying that American workers "don't need a lecture, they need a raise."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But if Clinton wouldn't advise that people work more, she would at least like to see more people working. Participation in the US workforce has fallen in recent years, and less overall work in the country means less production—and less growth.

In particular, Clinton emphasized a desire to bring more women into the workforce. The flood of women entering the workforce in the latter half of the last century boosted growth, but the US, one of the few advanced countries without paid family leave, has fallen to 17th in the OECD's ranking of female labor participation.

Clinton argued that the country needs better family-leave policies so that working women can be confident that a career won't stand between their—and their partner's—ability to care for their family; this would likely result in more women working over the course of their adult lifetime, and thus more prosperity in the US.

The policy may seem counter-intuitive—give more time off to get more overall work—but it has empirical backing. The political challenge will be convincing businesses to share the near-term costs of such a policy before the long-term benefits kick in.

This idea fits with the broad theme of Clinton's speech, discussing a problem that "didn't start with the recession, and it didn't end with the recovery," as fundamental trends in the economy toward skilled labor and flexible jobs have changed the traditional calculus for workers.

Those changes, and the anxieties they've caused for many Americans, will be at the forefront of the debate over domestic policy in the long campaign ahead.

Hillary Clinton: Here's how I'd run the economy // CS Monitor // Peter Grief – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton wants you to know that her vision for the US economy is different from Jeb Bush's, Marco Rubio's, and Scott Walker's. Oh, and Bernie Sanders's, too.

That's a bottom line from Democratic front-runner Clinton's big Monday speech about American workers, opportunity, and US business. Aides billed it as a kickoff address meant to set the former secretary of State apart from all her rivals in the race for 2016.

Her theme? As the shadow of the Great Recession continues to recede, the United States needs a "growth and fairness" approach to get the economy moving again full-speed.

"We can't create enough jobs and new businesses without more growth, and we can't build strong families and support our consumer economy without more fairness. We need both, because while America is standing again, we're not yet running the way we should," she said in New York.

Mrs. Clinton took on the major Republican contenders by name. She hit Mr. Bush for his comment from last week that Americans need to "work more hours," saying that he must not have met many American workers.

“Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the trucker who drives all night. Let him tell that to the fast-food workers marching in the streets for better pay. They don’t need a lecture – they need a raise,” said Clinton.

(Bush has said that what he really meant was that part-time workers need the opportunity to work more hours if they want.)

She criticized Senator Rubio’s tax plan as a “budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy." As for Governor Walker, she took aim at his attempts to curtail the power of public-sector unions.

“Evidence shows that the decline of unions may be responsible for a third of the increase of inequality among men. So if we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting workers,” Clinton said.

In contrast, Clinton did not mention Senator Sanders’s name. But she drew some lines that seemed intended to compare-and-contrast her economic plan with the beliefs of the rival who’s running to her left.

For instance, she talked about the need to confront Wall Street, as Sanders does, but she did not use his harsh language or endorse some of his more extreme proposals, such as breaking up big banks. Similarly, she backed an increase in the minimum wage, but without attaching a dollar figure, leaving herself some margin for maneuver.

Perhaps most important, she brought gender into her discussion of family needs. That’s not Sanders’s way of framing inequality. As Amber Phillips of "The Fix" political blog at The Washington Post notes, white liberal men are Sanders’s core supporters.

Clinton used a substantial portion of her speech to talk about the burdens women carry in the US economy as they try to balance family and work lives. Fair pay, flexible scheduling, paid family leave, earned sick days, and child care “are essential to our competitiveness and growth," she said.

The growing participation of women in the labor force in the US has stalled, said Clinton. That’s a lot of unused potential for the economy and US families, she said.

“Women who want to work should be able to do so without worrying every day about how they’re going to take care of their children or what will happen if a family member gets sick,” Clinton said.

Does Clinton want to force women to join the workforce? Of course not, writes Ramesh Ponnuru of the right-leaning National Review in a post critical of Clinton’s speech.

But Bush, with his “work more hours” line, wasn’t pushing Americans to work harder, either. He was just talking about opening up opportunity for those who want it, according to Mr. Ponnuru.

“If it’s fair game to distort his words, it’s fair game for the Republicans to say: Hey, Secretary Clinton, the stay-at-home moms of America don’t need a lecture from you,” he writes.

Hillary Clinton’s answer to t he wage gap: Profit-sharing? // CS Monitor // Jessica Mendoza – July 13, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jobs and the economy remain the most critical issues for candidates of the 2016 elections, and on Monday Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton will reveal how she plans to address them.

The former US senator and secretary of State is set to give her first major speech on economic policy on Monday at the progressive New School in New York City's Greenwich Village. In it she will emphasize middle-class incomes and wages, as well as detail what she calls a "win-win" plan to encourage profit-sharing between companies and their employees, her campaign said Monday.

Mrs. Clinton will also call for changing the tax code to help workers benefit, increasing investment in infrastructure projects, boosting the power of unions, and lowering costs of health care. She will also advocate for raising the federal minimum wage.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce," Clinton will say, according to excerpts of the speech obtained by Bloomberg.

Greater corporate profit-sharing "will be good for workers and good for business," because "studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets," Clinton is expected to say. "It's a win-win."

The speech, a product of consultation withmore than 200 domestic policy experts over the course of several months, is part of Clinton's bid to define herself against rivals in her party – particularly Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

Both candidates have tried to position themselves to the left of Clinton: Sen. Sanders has been working "to ignite a grassroots fire among left-leaning Democrats" who may be wary of Clinton, the Associated Press reportedin May, while Mr. O'Malley shot to the spotlight early in July with his open letter against what he called the "too-big-to-prosecute and too-big-to-jail" megabanks on Wall Street.

All three candidates have also been actively wooing Hispanic officials and labor groups – an effort that for Clinton bore fruit Saturday, when she received the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers union, which represents more than 1.6 million teachers and school personnel nationwide.

Clinton's New York address is also meant to portray her Republican opponents as beholden to tax cuts and quick fixes that will fail to revitalize stagnating incomes.

GOP candidates have tried to portray Clinton as out of touch with the electorate she is courting, and said her policies are simply a prescription for a bigger government role in the economy.

"What I will continue to point out is the fact that every policy she is pursuing will make income inequality worse, not better – crony capitalism even worse, not better," Carly Fiorina, former Hewlett Packard chief executive officer and Republican presidential hopeful, said on ABC's "This Week" Sunday. "And meanwhile, we will continue to crush the businesses that create jobs and middle class families."

Clinton also got into a Twitter tiff with former Florida governor Jeb Bush after Mr. Bush suggested that Americans need to work more hours to increase economic growth.

"Anyone who believes Americans aren't working hard enough hasn't met enough American workers," Clinton posted on the social media site.

Bush shot back: "Anyone who discounts 6.5 million people stuck in part-time work & seeking full-time jobs hasnt listened to working Americans."

Hillary Clinton Unveils Economic Agenda, but Can't Shake Wall Street Questions // National Journal // Emma Roller – July 13, 2015

When New School President David Van Zandt introduced Hillary Clinton on Monday, he made an inadvertent joke.

After Van Zandt said, "the New School does not endorse any particular candidate for political office," knowing laughter and clapping broke out in the audience. The New School has a proudly liberal history, thus making it a well-scouted venue for Clinton to give a populist speech about her economic platform.

In her speech, Clinton proposed three prongs for her economic policies: strong growth, fair growth, and long-term growth. What that looks like in policy terms: raising wages (especially for women), boosting participation in the workforce, encouraging profit-sharing for firms' employees, and deploying so-called "empowerment zones" to encourage growth in downtrodden cities. If that last one sounds familiar, it's because another candidate—Sen. Rand Paul—has already proposed a similar idea.

There was some tittering ahead of Clinton's speech that she would be attacking Uber, the ride-sharing service that's become a darling of the Republican Party. But whether she was alluding to disruptive businesses like Uber or entrenched Wall Street firms, her actual remarks hardly amounted to a scorched-earth attack.

"Many Americans are making extra money renting out a spare room, designing websites, selling products they designed themselves at home, or even driving their own car," Clinton said. "This on-demand or so-called 'gig economy' is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it's also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future."

Clinton also teased a plan to reform the capital-gains tax—a topic on which she has come under some scrutiny—that she says she'll get into when she visits New Hampshire later this week. And while the average voter's eyelids may start to droop as quick as you can say "capital-gains tax," it's become somewhat of a progressive litmus test for Democratic candidates. Democracy for America, one of the progressive groups that were agitating for an Elizabeth Warren presidential campaign, had a positive take on Clinton's economic speech.

"Coupled with Senator Bernie Sanders' early 2016 surge, today's speech illustrates the dominant force the Elizabeth Warren Wing is in the Democratic Party and the critical role it has already played in ensuring that income inequality, the moral issue of our time, sits at the very center of the 2016 presidential debate," Jim Dean, Democracy for America's chair, said in a statement.

There are still some gaps in Clinton's economic agenda. Both Sanders and Martin O'Malley have said they would raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour, while Clinton has remained mum on the exact wage she would seek. Some have argued that doubling the minimum wage would be too risky a move, and one that may reduce employment.

Still, for Democrats, Clinton's policies are light-years ahead of those of her Republican counterparts. And that's something she latched onto in her speech on Monday while avoiding criticism of her primary opponents. Clinton called out Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker by name to criticize their views on labor, taxes, and unions, respectively.

On Bush's comment that "people need to work longer hours": "You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. Well, he must not have met very many American workers. Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day, or the teacher who is in that classroom, or the trucker who drives all night. Let him tell that to the fast-food worker marching in the streets for better pay. They don't need a lecture. They need a raise."

On Rubio's proposed tax plan: "We hear Republican candidates talk a lot about tax reform, but take a good look at their plans. Senator Rubio's would cut taxes for households making around $3 million a year by almost $240,000, which is way more than three times the earnings of a typical family. Well, that's a sure budget-busting giveaway to the super-wealthy, and that's the kind of bad economics you're likely to hear from any of the candidates on the other side."

On Walker stripping public-employee unions in his state of collective bargaining: "Alongside tax reform, it's time to stand up to efforts across our country to undermine worker bargaining power, which has been proven again and again to drive up wages. Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names stomping on workers' rights, and practically all the Republican candidates hope to do the same as president. I will fight back against these mean-spirited, misguided attacks."

Hillary Clinton unveils economic plan with jabs at Wall St and her opponents // Telegraph // Peter Foster – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton set down the economic battle-lines for the 2016 US general election Monday, promising to rebuild the American dream while issuing a stinging attack on the “criminal” excesses of some sections of the Wall Street banking culture.

In a two-pronged strategy, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination attacked her Republican opponents for their “trickle-down” economic theories while seeking to defend against criticism from the Left wing of her own party about her links with Wall Street and big business interests.

Promising to raise incomes for America’s middle classes, Mrs Clinton singled out Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor who is likely to be one of her most formidable opponents in the 2016 race, for his recent remarks saying Americans needed to raise their productivity.

“You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. He must not have met very many American workers .... They don’t need a lecture, they need a raise,” she said in a speech in New York.

Mrs Clinton, who can earn $250,000 (£160,000) from a single speaking engagement – nearly five times the current annual median US household income – has worked hard in recent months to burnish her credentials with ordinary Americans, embarking on a “listening tour” in key battleground states.

As president, Mrs Clinton promised new measures to boost incomes, such as schemes to increase corporate profit-sharing schemes, as well as new plans to help women, working families and low-skilled workers make better livings.

“The measure of our success must be how much incomes rise for hard-working families — not just for successful CEOs and money managers,” she said, before launching a scathing attack on “hedge funds” and “high-frequency traders”, her voice at times larded with disdain.

The populist rhetoric was aimed as much at her Democrat opponents, such as Bernie Sanders, the socialist Vermont senator who has rapidly closed to within 8 points of Mrs Clinton in the key primary state of New Hampshire, as it was at Republicans.

Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor who is also running clearly to the Left of Mrs Clinton, was quick to push back after the speech, saying in a statement that "vague promises" would not rebuild the American dream.

His own policies, widely seen as far-fetched but appealing to the Left, include offering debt-free college education within five years, passing a $15 minimum wage and converting America to 100 per cent renewable energy by 2050.

Republicans have retreated to populist rhetoric of their own, arguing that the same policies derided by Mrs Clinton – tax breaks, welfare cuts and union-busting – is the real road back to a high-growth economy and restoring middle class prosperity.

Among the leading proponents of that strategy is Scott Walker, the 47-year-old governor of the Midwestern state of Wisconsin who will launch his campaign today by touting his record crushing teachers unions and cutting taxes in his own state.

"He balanced budgets, cut taxes and beat the special interests, improved education, created jobs and showed how to fight and win," said a promotional video announcing his White House bid. He will become the fifteenth Republican to enter the race.

Mr Bush, who has promised to double America's current economic growth rate to four per cent per year, led Republican retorts to Mrs Clinton's brand of economics – dubbed "fair-left not far-left" by her own strategists – calling her "defeatist" for ducking annual growth targets.

Marco Rubio, the young Cuban-American senator from Florida who is widely seen as a leading challenger to Mr Bush, also attacked Mrs Clinton for what he said was a backward-looking speech full of tired ideas.

"She seems to believe pumping more of today's money into yesterday's programs will bring prosperity tomorrow. It will not," he said, "Increasing taxes and regulations will not promote fairness or opportunity; it will snuff out innovation and crush small business."

Rick Perry, the former Texas governor whose state led the US in job-creation on the back of the shale-oil boom, accused Mrs Clinton of "re-gifting" the economic policies of the Obama administration that had left wages flat and job creation stagnant.

"There is a proven blueprint for job creation in this country, and it is based on lowering taxes and reining in out of control, bureaucratic red tape," he said.

Hillary Clinton wants to raise wages for women and average Americans // Independent // Justin Carissimo – July 13, 2015

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton announced her economic plan in New York on Monday.

"We need new ideas ... One that I believe in and will fight for is profit sharing," she said.

"Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of state spoke at the New School, a progressive university in Greenwich Village on Monday morning. Ms Clinton proposed tax breaks for companies that create programmes to share profits with employees to raise action for middle-class wages.

The Washington Post received an early release of the report, and revealed that Ms Clinton wants to boost women's pay and ensure more women are in the workforce.

"Clinton will call for paid leave policies to help women work while raising families. That might help raising the number of women in the labor force, which has flatlined after years of growth. How much such a policy will to close pay disparities between men and women isn't as clear," the newspaper said.

Ms Clinton will urge growth by increasing taxes on the wealthiest Americans, raising the federal minimum wage, new child care benefits, federal subsidies for college tuition as well as laws that would help expand unions.

She said her framework would help sustain "an economy that grows faster, fairer and more sustainably so that everyday Americans can get ahead and stay ahead."

The Centre for American Progress, a liberal think tank with strong ties to the campaign, released a report.

The presidential hopeful will provide further details on the plan at an event on Thursday in New Hampshire.

Hillary Clinton: America is leaving 'talent on the sidelines' by limiting women at work // Mashable // Megan Specia – July 13, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton outlined her planned economic policy focusing on the middle class — with a special emphasis on gender equality in the workforce, small business and the protection of unions — during a speech in New York City on Monday.

She didn't hesitate to open her address by slamming Republican politicians for failed "trickle down" economic policies.

"Twice now in the past 20 years, a Democratic president has had to come in and clean up the mess left behind," Clinton said before proceeding on her wide-ranging policy plans.

"We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middle class life," said Clinton, a theme she carried throughout her announcement at the New School in Manhattan. "And that will be my mission from the first day I am president to the last."

Much of her speech focused on the challenges faced by women in the workforce. She said that fair pay, fair scheduling, paid family leave, earned sick days and childcare are essential, adding that by limiting women in the workforce, American limits its own potential.

"We can't afford to leave talent on the sidelines, but that's exactly what we are doing," Clinton said.

"Women who want to work should be able to do so without worrying everyday about how they are going to care for their children or what they are going to do if a family member gets sick," said Clinton. "I am well aware that for far too long, these challenges have been dismissed by some as women's issues, well those days are over."

Clinton also made the case for defending the collective bargaining power of unions. Over the weekend, Clinton became the first major candidate to earn the endorsement of a national labor union when the American Federation of Teachers (AFT) said they would be supporting her in 2016. The AFT includes 1.6 million members and retirees nationwide.

She specifically called out newly declared GOP candidate Gov. Scott Walker, who announced his campaign on Monday. Walker is known nationally for efforts to limit the power of unions in his home state of Wisconsin.

"Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their names by stomping on workers rights," said Clinton. "I will fight back against these mean spirited misguided attacks."

Clinton also emphasized that if elected president, her policy would have a long-term focus.

"I believe part of public service is planting trees under whose shade you'll never sit," said Clinton.

The Uber economy worries Hillary Clinton a little // Mashable // Seth Figerman – July 13, 2015

Uber is suddenly becoming a talking point in the 2016 presidential race.

During her first major economic policy address since entering the 2016 presidential race, Hillary Clinton praised the innovation of startups that let "many Americans" make extra money by renting out spare rooms and offering rides in their cars, but she nonetheless tossed out a veiled threat at the way these and other businesses operate.

"I'll crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages," Clinton said in her economic speech at the New School in Manhattan on Monday.

Her remarks come as billion-dollar startups like Uber and Lyft are under mounting scrutiny from legislators, court judges and the media for classifying drivers as independent contractors rather than part-time or full-time employees entitled to healthcare benefits, sick time and paid time off.

Clinton did not cite any businesses by name in her comments, but earlier in her speech she expressed concern about the "gig economy" which comes without healthcare or benefits.

"This on demand or so called gig economy is creating exciting opportunities and unleashing innovation, but it is also raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future," Clinton said in her speech at the New School in Manhattan on Monday.

Businesses like Uber argue that many of their employees actually prefer to be contractors, rather than employees, for the freedom it provides. Some contractors work for multiple startups, or choose to work only a few hours or days per week. Left unspoken, however, is the fact that classifying most or all contractors as employees would cut into these companies' profit margins, perhaps forcing them to raise prices or otherwise change their approach.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Uber, in particular, is currently trying to fend off a pending class action lawsuit arguing that its drivers in California officially be recognized as employees. The ride-hailing company has recently lost a smaller, non-precedent setting case, with a court ruling that one individual driver was entitled to retroactive compensation entitled to proper employees.

Clinton stopped short of explaining exactly how she intended to crack down on this business practice, or offer an alternative arrangement for startups like Uber in particular.

The former Secretary of State isn't the only one with Uber on the mind: Jeb Bush, a Republican candidate for president, is reportedly planning to "hail an Uber" later this week and talk publicly about "the importance of innovation."

The growing number of presidential candidates talking about the on-demand economy is a testament to the fast growth and impact of this sector, but it could lead to even greater scrutiny of these businesses at a time when they are already mounting defenses against political and regulatory attacks around the world.

Perhaps recognizing the sensitive political optics and business risks, several similar startups have proactively shifted their approach: Instacart, a grocery delivery service, has begun converting contractors to part-time employees in select markets. Shyp, a startup for delivering packages, has also shifted to classifying its contractors as W2 employees.

The overall theme of Clinton's speech was calling for the need to "build a growth and fairness economy," which would better support the middle class and push for broader prosperity as we move further past the global recession of 2008.

In addition to concerns about the sharing economy, Clinton name-checked every major economic and financial problem of the moment. teased plans to help ease the burden of student loan debt, called for immigration reform, criticized high-frequency trading and slammed the "quarterly capitalism" trend of businesses looking to appease investors through stock buybacks and ever-larger dividends, rather than investing long-term in workers through greater pay and additional resources. She also advocated for women at work and said she wants to be the "small-business president."

7 Fem inist Aspects Of Hillary Clinton's Economic Plan That Would Change Everything For Women In America
// Bustle // Kendyl Kearly – July 13, 2015

Although she has been criticized for months for not being open enough, both in terms of communicating with the press and on her key policy points, Hillary Clinton laid out an expansive, feminist economic plan on Monday in a speech at the traditionally liberal New School in New York City. There, Clinton offered specific policy plans on a number of economic issues, like the need for corporations to profit-share with employees, education investments, tax code reform, and health care costs. However, the most optimistic point in her address was Clinton's focus on handling economic issues that specifically affect women — both for the sake of women's rights, Clinton noted, and for the growth of America's economy.

Deeply important issues like the gender pay gap and affordable childcare for working mothers are often lumped with abortion and contraception access into the broad, vague "women's issues" category by candidates. By bringing attention to the need for feminist economic reform, Clinton made clear she sees the lack of pro-women economic initiatives as a serious fiscal issue, noting, "These challenges have been dismissed by some as women's issues. Well, those days are over."

Although analysts might have expected such a high-profile feminist candidate to make fixing these problems a part of her platform, the pro-women points underlying her entire economic plan were much unprecedented. Some

Equal Pay

In the economic dialogue of presidential candidates, fair pay rarely gets tat much attention. The focus typically goes to the national debt, unemployment, and welfare, to name a few. As important as those issues are, they are no more noteworthy than the fact that on average, women are paid less than men for doing the same work. The research varies, but the Pew Research Center has the gap at 84 cents on the dollar. Even if it's 99 cents on the dollar, this is a genuine economic problem, and a presidential candidate is finally making it a priority.

Paid Family Leave

Clinton also addressed the need for paid family leave. A lack of paid family leave is often one of the reasons women fall behind in the corporate world. They sometimes have to leave a job for maternity leave and do not find their jobs waiting for them when they return. In May, Clinton said, according to The Hill, "At a time that should be so exciting and joyful, I see so many women just distraught."

Fair Scheduling

Irregular hours and just-in-time scheduling hit women hard. They often have to deal with finding child care, and 6 million women have said a lack of fair scheduling is why they don't have full-time employment, according to Al Jazeera America. Women often work irregular hours and excessive overtime or face losing their jobs. Clinton has made herself one of the few politicians — nor just among the presidential candidates but among all lawmakers — to address this.

Affordable Child Care

Clinton also cites a lack of affordable child care as a reason women are held back. Her plan to give working and middle class families access to pre-k education fits in with this issue. If more women could afford child care, they could have the option of building careers or investing in higher education.

Earned Sick Days

A lack of earned sick days for employees can end up putting women behind their male coworkers. When a child is sick, a working mother often has to decide whether to take time off and possibly lose her job or go to work and risk the wellbeing of their family. One study revealed that working women are twice as likely to experience a job loss because of family illness, according to NJ Time To Care. Clinton wants to make sure everyone has access to the sick days they deserve.

Increased Minimum Wage

Although Clinton's support of a higher minimum wage is not a gender-specific issue, it could help a lot of women. The single mother is particularly susceptible to falling into poverty. One third of all families headed by single mothers were below the poverty line in 2013, about 15.6 million households, according to The Huffington Post.

Other Employee Benefits

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also wants to give employees more benefits and training. With women making up 47.21 percent of the workforce, according to The Huffington Post, worker benefits would definitely help them get ahead. Giving women the opportunity to get more training could be a factor in disassembling the glass ceiling — the idea that women don't get promoted as often or as quickly as men.

No major presidential candidate has ever really given these concerns so much intentness. No candidate has every promised to take them on with such fervor. Maybe it just took a female frontrunner. Maybe it just took Hillary.

It's the [Sharing] Economy, Stupid // Medium // Damian O'Doherty – July 13, 2015

Secretary Clinton's rebuke of Uber, Airbnb, and the sharing economy in her recent economic address is the 2016 campaign's first George H.W. Bush 1992 grocery scanner moment—where a visibly disconnected politician uncomfortably assesses a not-so-modern technology with bemusement. What's more troubling to progressives is that while Bush, Sr. seemed disconnected with the future, Secretary Clinton seems to declare war on it. Can anyone imagine President Bill Clinton railing against Amazon.com or eBay in the 1990s? How can a leader fight the future?

It's a troubling moment for the Democratic Party when our potential standard bearer dismisses the future of work, American innovation, and the lifestyle of the WE generation—all in one speech. Democrats have always been the party of the future, but Secretary Clinton's economic speech on Monday was much more interested in where we've been than where we're going.

Whether it's Gen Xers, millennials, or my mom in Memphis, "metroDemocrats" will, and rightfully should, challenge any candidate who wants to take our party—and our nation—backwards.

Luckily, we have leaders who get it. Leaders who understand that moving forward doesn't have to mean a wholesale rejection of the past; who understand that a traditional, W2-based economy can survive, and even thrive, in an era of innovation and risk-taking.

Leaders like Governor Martin O'Malley, who are willing to stand up and say that "an economy is not money—an economy is people," and who made sure that innovation was allowed to thrive in Maryland while ensuring that workers were protected and supported. A leader who could pair an increase in the minimum wage with fair regulations to ensure that companies grow while workers enjoyed the highest per capita income in the country. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, rarely a voice for progressives, rated Maryland the number one state for innovation and entrepreneurship three years in row.

We know the sharing economy is a foundation for a new kind of progress—progress that gives workers the freedom to choose their own hours, locations, and clients. Progress that allows new Americans, young people, and entrepreneurs decide the terms of their employment.

This is the kind of American problem solving that has taken hold across the globe, showing our national brand to the world as more than just militarism and consumerism. The last three Uber trips from my house were women driving women to work and school. More globally, Uber's United Nations Women partnership plans to employ 1,000,000 women from around the globe in the next 5 years.

An economy isn't money, it's people.

Cities like San Francisco, Austin, Boston, Des Moines, Manchester, and Baltimore show where the global future wants to be. That's what the data tells us: that America is home to growing and attractive cities because of their BIG D Democratic values of density, innovation, connectivity, and interdependence. Millennials don't retreat to three-car garages. They want to get together and solve problems: local, social, and mobile. Martin O'Malley is a guru of these values—delivering open, data driven platforms that allow everyone to have a fair fight about the future. And to get to where they want to go, as efficiently as possible.

Washington is different. Since 1994, the year the booming Amazon.com was founded, Washington staffers and professionals have been perversely promoted and paid more for not getting things done. These incentives for under achievement are the hallmark of the last three decades of American politics. Martin O'Malley is different. As the innovator of American politics, he fights to create an entrepreneurial common platform that allows us all to get going somewhere together, share data, find shared solutions, and move forward. Together.

Hillary Clinton Touts Banking Reform And Bashes HSBC, Despite Clinton Charitable Foundation Taking Money From The Bank In 2014 // IB Times // Clark Mindock – July 13, 2015

Speaking in an auditorium in New York City on Monday, Hillary Clinton delivered an expansive policy address that looked to position herself as a champion of middle class voters and an advocate of tough banking policies. While speaking about the misconduct of financial institutions, however, Clinton mentioned HSBC, which her family's charitable foundation, the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), accepted money from in 2014 in spite of a recent money laundering settlement.

"Stories of misconduct by individuals and institutions in the financial industry are shocking" Clinton said. "HSBC allowing drug cartels to launder money, five major banks pleading guilty to felony charges for conspiring to manipulate currency exchange and interest rates. There can be no justification or tolerance for this kind of criminal behavior."

Just two years before the 2014 HSBC donation to CGI, the bank reached a nearly $2 billion settlement agreement with the U.S. government over money laundering charges. The foundation is also known to have received donations from wealthy donors with accounts in HSBC's controversial Swiss banks, where clients are said to stash money to avoid paying taxes.

Donations to the Clinton charitable foundations have raised questions on the influence that big money players from banks to foreign governments might have on the former secretary of state. At the same time, Clinton has delivered speeches on the campaign trail saying she will take banks to task as president. The charitable donations are not said to be illegal.

A CNN review of Clinton Global Initiative donations earlier this year showed that, in 2014, HSBC gave between $500,000 and $1 million for the CGI yearly meeting, which qualifies the bank in the highest support tier possible for the event. The Department of Justice and U.S. Treasury announced in 2012 that HSBC had to pay a $1.92 billion settlement over allegations that the bank allowed drug cartels to launder money and that HSBC violated U.S. sanctions by conducting transactions for customers in Iran, Libya, Sudan and Burma. It was unclear whether or not the bank had donated to the foundation in previous years.

A separate Guardian investigation from February connected $81 million in donations from wealthy donors with accounts in the HSBC bank in Geneva at the center of the controversy. The identities were discovered through memo leaks from a computer expert at the bank, and included a Canadian mining magnate, Frank Giustra, who donated $1 million from the tax-free haven. Hedge fund manager and convicted sex offender, Jeffrey Epstein, also donated money.

While mentioning the bank, Clinton was discussing her support for the Dodd-Frank reform act, which has become the target of Republicans. She said that she will support the act's continued existence against Republican attacks and called for it to go further.

"I will fight back against these attacks and protect the reforms we've made. We can do that and still ease burdens on community banks to encourage responsible loans to local people and businesses they know and trust," she said. "We also have to go beyond Dodd-Frank."

The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment for this story.

Hillary Clinton Uses First Economic Speech to Attack Top GOP Opponent s // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – July 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Monday that her presidency would be devoted to ensuring a "growth and fairness economy."

"We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans," Clinton said in her first policy speech since launching her bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. "That will be my mission from my first day as president to the last."

The former secretary of state introduced points for her economic agenda that she promised to speak more about during the week. She defended President Barack Obama's economic record, and criticized large companies for thinking about short-term gains, which she said come at the expense of longterm growth.

Clinton talked about several ideas she has mentioned before, such as early-childhood education, an increased minimum wage and defending Obamacare. The newest idea she pledged explain more about this week was boosting incentives for companies to provide profit-sharing to employees.

"I will propose ways to encourage companies to share profits with their employees," Clinton said. "That will be good for workers and good for business. Studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company's success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees' pockets. It's a win-win."

Clinton faces an awkward situation as a Democratic presidential candidate arguing for higher wages, amid slow wage growth during the Obama administration.

As the leading Democrat in most polls, Clinton gave a glimpse as to who she has narrowed her expected Republicans opponents down to, targeting former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and race newcomer, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

"You may have heard Governor Bush say last week that Americans just need to work longer hours. He must not have met very many American workers," Clinton said to applause.

Bush spoke last week about underemployment and not enough few full-time jobs. Clinton talked about nurses, truck drivers and fast-food workers logging on long hours, and said, "They don't need a lecture—they need a raise."

Walker, who formally announced Monday morning, was also in her crosshairs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Republican governors like Scott Walker have made their name by stomping out worker’s rights,” Clinton said. She added, “If we want to get serious about raising incomes, we have to get serious about supporting union workers.”

She further said that Rubio’s tax plan is a “budget-busting giveaway” to the wealthy.

After taking shots at her opponents though, Clinton sounded conciliatory.

“We have to break out of the poisonous partisan gridlock and focus on the long term needs of our country,” Clinton said.

Experts React, Fact-Check McCain Speech on Nuclear Proliferation

~ All agree that his unrealistic rhetoric and confrontational stances are unproductive to keeping America and the world safe and secure ~

Washington, D.C. - In reaction to John McCain's speech this morning on his views on nuclear proliferation and greater strategy for Asia, National Security Network compiled the following reactions from experts who agree that the speech and his overall outlook are misguided and return to the failed policies of the past:

> "John McCain says we should not undermine our allies by talking to North Korea, but in fact our allies in East Asia want us to talk to and engage North Korea. We lost their confidence under the Bush administration by holding to ideological positions that did not work instead of listening to our friends and working the problem to a realistic solution. Returning to the isolationist days of the first Bush term will only weaken our alliance and give North Korea a justification to resume their nuclear efforts."
> -Jon Wolfsthal, Fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies

> "Senator McCain's speech conveniently glosses over the largest factor undermining American ability to stem the flow of nuclear weapons in Asia and around the world: our strategic preoccupation in Iraq. For a Senator campaigning on reasserting America's diplomatic leverage to decrease the proliferation of these deadly weapons, his "100 year" Iraq plan further hinders our power to do just that."
> -Price Floyd, Director of External Relations, Center for a New American Security

> "John McCain has made a major effort to reach for the votes of the of the arms control community with a broad speech on non-proliferation. Unfortunately, cooperation with Russia, the basic premise of the speech, is undermined by his earlier promise to throw Russia out of the G-8 and his continued support for ballistic missile defense in eastern Europe. An odd slip-up for a purported national security expert."
> -Rand Beers, President of the National Security Network

Also, John Wolfsthal wrote the following longer reaction piece to McCain's speech:

McCain's Nonproliferation Policy-It's a Wolf in Sheep's Clothing

John McCain's speech on nuclear weapons seems to adopt the narrowest of lenses in dealing with nuclear weapons. Moreover, his proposals - many of which might sound good - don't match up with other things he has said on nuclear weapons, on Russia, on Iran and suggests he doesn't really get the complexity of these issues. Lastly, the tone may be better, but many of the proposals-not to mention his language choices-are right out of George W. Bush's play book. This may be a wolf in sheep's clothing, but it is still a wolf.

1) He wants to work with Russia on arms control and tactical nuclear weapons, but he also wants to kick Russia out of the G-8. Not sure how you get them to play nice on nukes after you kick them in the teeth. Also, Bush adopted a loose standard on counting nuclear weapons and verification. Will McCain (who is now working with John Bolton - father of Bush arms control dogma) be any better?

2) I applaud his desire to get tactical nuclear weapons out of Europe, but if we pull nuclear weapons out of Turkey as Iran advances its nuclear program, they are not going to have increased confidence in NATO and the US. This speech, and the references to it, will send shock waves through Europe and and a McCain Administration would start in a hole.

3) He does not walk away from the new "reliable replacement warhead" being pitched by the Bush administration. Lots of wiggle room for him, left there on purpose, I would guess.

4) Why is only the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) going to review nuclear policy? Where are the experts on nonproliferation, diplomacy, history, etc? This is the same line the Bush administration gave. In May of 2000, standing in front of Secretary Kissinger and other republican heavy-weights, then-candidate Bush said he would reduce nuclear weapons to the lowest number consistent with U.S. security. Sound familiar? McCain's statement is almost an exact quote. The JCS has set the current floor on reductions. The President sets the war guidance for the level of nuclear weapons, and leaving it to the JCS is a recipe for the status quo.

5) Did anyone else notice that McCain did not repudiate the policy of regime change? I know why Iran and North Korea want nuclear weapons. Reducing ours will not get them to change their course. Of course, singing "bomb bomb Iran" to the tune of "Barbara Ann" won't do it either. Is McCain really suggesting cutting our nukes will lead others to reduce theirs? It's the broader policy that needs changing, not just the number of nukes.

6) Coming out of left field (or from pander-ville) is the remark about international nuclear storage. It is possible that Russia might build a storage facility for countries in East Asia, but McCain seems to be suggesting some other country is going to accept our huge (the world's largest) stock of spent fuel and that this might be a way to avoid opening the spent fuel repository in Yucca Mountain, Nevada. Talk about pandering. Who does he think is going to take our nuclear waste? Even if someone would take it off our hands, the stuff contains about 100,000 weapons worth of plutonium that must be dealt with. Does McCain really want to export that to a country poor enough to want into the nuclear waste storage business?

7) Either you are for the ban on nuclear testing or you are not. The Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty is the most studied arms control agreement in history. It has been verifiable since the 1960s. McCain voted against it. To play the "let's study it again" dance is too cute by half. If the President does not support it, it is not going to happen. Also, McCain seems to be suggesting we should re-open the agreement for new modifications. That is the fastest way to kill it. He also talks about limiting testing. We want to ban testing. We have more nuclear expertise than anyone - why we would want to make the world safe for others to test nuclear weapons is unclear. Obama and Clinton have said they are for the CTBT and plan to fight for its ratification. McCain has not. The rest of the world - including the states we need on our side to deal with Iran and North Korea - are embarrassed that we have not ratified it.

McCain's speech is a feeble attempt to try to tie all Republicans and Democrats into the failures of the Bush administration nuclear policies. Before 2000, the US was on the right track. The > regime needed work, but was sound - more states had given up nuclear weapons and weapon programs in the 1980s and 90s than had begun them. Now that track record lies in ashes - because of the Bush Administration approach, backed by a Republican Congress that killed the CTBT and sought to restrict funding for nuclear security efforts during 2000-2004. McCain is promising more of the same.

NSN's policy team produced the following posts below on DemocracyArsenal further scrutinizing the speech and McCain's Wall Street Journal Op-Ed :

McCain's Disjointed Russia Policy
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

OK, so John McCain is back to wishful thinking today laying out his bold new plan for stemming proliferation. Obviously, reducing the stockpiles of nuclear weapons is critical to American and world security. But his plan misses one slightly important detail. The critical players in this field are obviously Russia and the United States - by far the two largest nuclear powers in the world. McCain proposes a close working relationship with the Russians on these issues, and yet just two months ago in Los Angeles when he laid out his view of the world, he suggested tossing Russia out of the G8 - a needlessly provocative act that would essentially mark the start of a new Cold War in Europe. On top of that he continues to support a regional missile defense system for Europe, which a crucial nuclear security concern for the Russians. Does he really think that he can alienate the Russians and at the same time get their cooperation on critical nuclear issues? Is he that divorced from reality? Or is he just ignoring what he said two months ago? Either way, it doesn't make much sense.

Here is what he said at the Los Angeles Council on World Affairs:

> We should start by ensuring that the G-8, the group of eight highly industrialized states, becomes again a club of leading market democracies: it should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia. Rather than tolerate Russia's nuclear blackmail or cyber attacks, Western nations should make clear that the solidarity of NATO, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, is indivisible and that the organization's doors remain open to all democracies committed to the defense of freedom.

And here is what he is saying today:

> As our two countries possess the overwhelming majority of the world's nuclear weapons, we have a special responsibility to reduce their number. I believe we should reduce our nuclear forces to the lowest level we judge necessary, and we should be prepared to enter into a new arms control agreement with Russia reflecting the nuclear reductions I will seek. Further, we should be able to agree with Russia on binding verification measures based on those currently in effect under the START Agreement, to enhance confidence and transparency.

McCain's basic plan is to slap the Russians smack across the face and then ask them for a favor. Somehow I don't think that will work.

McCain apparently does not understand US policy toward Iran
Posted by Max Bergmann

In John McCain's speech today he says something very very puzzling:

> Many believe all we need to do to end the nuclear programs of hostile governments is have our president talk with leaders in Pyongyang and Tehran, as if we haven't tried talking to these governments repeatedly over the past two decades.

So McCain thinks that the President of the United States has been negotiating with the Iranians for the past two decades? Huh? Does McCain not understand that the stated policy of the U.S. government since April 7, 1980 has been to NOT TALK TO THE IRANIANS. And that we have not negotiated with Iran over their nuclear weapons program.

McCain More Extreme Than Bush on North Korea
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

So on top of North Korea McCain decides that on North Korea it's actually better to be more extreme than George Bush. From 2000-2006 the Administration pursued a failed policy that got us no closer to eliminating the nuclear threat and actually ended with the detonation of a North Korean nuclear bomb. Now McCain says he wants to return to that policy:

> American leadership is also needed on North Korea. We must use the leverage available from the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after Pyongyang's 2006 nuclear test to ensure the full and complete declaration, disablement and irreversible dismantlement of its nuclear facilities, in a verifiable manner, which we agreed to with the other members of the six-party talks.

Seems innocent enough, except it didn't work for six years and has now been dismissed by all but the hardest line Bush Administration officials. Glen Kessler has more .

What is John McCain talking about?
Posted by Max Bergmann
I mean really - what is he talking about?

In the Wall Street Journal today, McCain and Lieberman write?

> Top leaders in Asia have warned that a precipitous American retreat from Iraq would empower al Qaeda in its global terror campaign and badly undermine America's position in Asia. We should listen to them.

Which top leaders? Who are they talking about? Do McCain and Lieberman realize that John Howard is no longer Prime Minister of Australia?

DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

After Clinton's failed 'reset' with Putin, now she wants to do a 'reset' with Castro. She is making another mistake.

By Perry Bacon Jr. and Juliet Eilperin; A06
Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) are aggressively courting Latino voters in the early stages of their election contest, as the presumptive Republican nominee looks to hold on to Latino-heavy states, such as New Mexico, that Obama hopes to turn blue.

McCain says Obama should visit South America (Reuters 7/14/08)
By Steve Holland
Republican presidential candidate John McCain, who has hectored Democratic rival Barack Obama to visit Iraq, now says Obama should go to South America as well. McCain, an Arizona senator, is to make the case in a speech on Monday in San Diego to the National Council of La Raza, one of the most important advocacy groups in the United States for Hispanic Americans.

Offshore Drilling Backed as Remedy for Oil Prices (Washington Post 7/14/08)
By Steven Mufson; A01
Push for U.S. Exploration Gains Traction, but Big Political Hurdles Remain... The issue has become a dividing line for the presidential candidates. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) reversed his position last month and endorsed expanded offshore drilling, while Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) wants to maintain the moratorium on offshore drilling, which he says would do nothing to immediately lower gasoline prices. In the past week, congressional Republicans have issued a blizzard of statements pushing for action before summer recess, and some Democrats may be leaning their way.

McCain misfires on Obama attack (CNN Political Ticker 7/11/08)
By Evan Glass and Kerith McFadden
It turns out that John McCain made an off-the-mark error when he launched at Barack Obama this week over Iran's missile tests. In a statement criticizing Obama's positions on the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, the organization claiming credit for the missile launches, McCain wrote, "This is the same organization that I voted to condemn as a terrorist organization when an amendment was on the floor of the United States Senate. Senator Obama refused to vote." The problem with the critique? McCain also missed that vote on the Kyl-Lieberman amendment on September 26, 2007.

Obama's Enigma (Washington Post 7/13/08)
By David S. Broder; B07
John McCain is the candidate who actually had experience as a wartime flier, but Barack Obama is the one who has most successfully adapted a favorite tactic of those intrepid aviators. When the pilots were over a target heavily defended by antiaircraft guns, they would release a cloud of fine metal scraps, hoping to confuse the aim of the shells or missiles being fired in their direction.

Democrats, the military, and McCain (Boston Globe 7/13/08)
By Jeff Jacoby, Globe Columnist
FOUR YEARS ago, Democrats couldn't laud military service - especially that of their presidential standard-bearer - highly enough... Given that effusive show of respect for military experience in 2004, you would think no Democrat this year could even contemplate disparaging John McCain's far more extensive military career. ... Yet in recent months, one Democrat after another has gone out of his way to diminish or criticize McCain's war record. A partial list:

There He Goes Again (NYT 7/12/08)
This has been a week in which the stock markets lurched sickeningly downward. The treasury secretary had to swat away rumors that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the pillars of the mortgage business, may be crumbling. Oil prices spiked, again. Airlines cut schedules and raised prices, again. And the best that could be said about one of the nation's biggest companies, General Electric, was that it didn't do worse in the second quarter than Wall Street had expected.

Phil Gramm Is Right (Washington Post 7/12/08)
By Amity Shlaes; A13
"In serious consideration for ambassador to Belarus." That's the role John McCain joked that former senator Phil Gramm might have in a McCain administration. Gramm is McCain's most senior economic adviser, the one best qualified to lead the finance team of a McCain presidency. Now, however, Gramm faces political exile because he made the mistake of telling the truth.

McCain Campaign Needs a Shot of Viagra (RealClearPolitics 7/12/08)
By Toby Harnden
If there's one thing that John McCain does not want to spend time talking about, it's Viagra. Barack Obama can make breezy stump jokes about adverts showing happy couples skipping through fields. For the 71-year-old Arizona senator, however, there's just no upside to any focus on the pharmaceutical product of choice of Bob Dole, the last battered war veteran to run - rather haplessly - for president.

Recent Bush Victories Smell of Compromise (Washington Post 7/13/08)
By Dan Eggen and Paul Kane; A04
The decider has become the compromiser. President Bush has racked up a series of significant political victories in recent weeks, on surveillance reform, war funding and an international agreement on global warming, but only after engaging in the kind of conciliation with opponents that his administration has often avoided.

The Bush administration made clear on Friday that it will do virtually nothing to regulate the greenhouse gases that cause global warming. Since 9/11, Westerners have tried two approaches to fight terrorism in Pakistan, President Bush's and Greg Mortenson's. Mr. Bush has focused on military force and provided more than $10 billion ... to the highly unpopular government of President Pervez Musharraf. This approach has failed... POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Wall Street Journal: " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. "He did exactly what Hillary did," said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: "When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio's spokeswoman said they had been deleted." (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press, "Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival." [AP, 3/7/15]

As a serial entrepreneur with vast amounts of experience in garnering contracts with the federal government, Mr. Jiang has proven to be a tremendous asset for Mr. Salandra.

  - CEO paired Dorothea Gillette-Spencer, CEO and Owner of D-Gillette Industrial Services, with former EMP Mentee, Sam Thevanayagam, President of PartsLife,Inc. Sam worked with Dorothea to review her pricing strategy andrealized that she was under-pricing her services. Malawi

- CDI is finalizing the sub-lease agreement to submit to Press Agriculture for additional farms for the Anchor Farm Project. In addition, CDI is working with John Deere on a final list of equipment needed for the coming planting season. Agreements with investors are being finalized to develop an agro-distribution business in Malawi to provide services to smallholder farmers involved the project.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Colombia

- In July, the suppliers in CGSGI's Cartagena hotel supplier network project will reach $2 million in sales since the project's inception. Suppliers include purveyors of fish and seafood, processed foods, agricultural products and uniforms. When CGSGI began this project, the Cartagena hospitality industry did not use local suppliers. As a result of CGSGI's supplier capacity building efforts, the hotels are now committed toprocuring from local supply chains, resulting in business efficiencies for the hospitality industry and job creation for Cartagena's low income community.

- Due to this project's success, the hotels have asked CGSGI to expand the supplier base and provide trained labor for the expanding Cartagena hotel sector. CGSGI is currently evaluating the creation of two social enterprises—one that would be a sustainable for-profit intermediary between the hotels and suppliers and one that would establish a Cartagena training center for hospitality labor. CGSGI is also evaluating similar projects for Cusco, Peru and Acapulco, Mexico.

Questions McCain Across the Board (CNN 10/22/08 4:30pm)

MCCAIN: BLITZER: Let's talk about taxes right now.

MCCAIN: Sure.

BLITZER: It's a key issue. Among other things, you would like to cut -- and correct me if I'm wrong -- the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 25 percent. Is that right?

MCCAIN: Absolutely. Absolutely.

BLITZER: Because what he says and what Democrats, a lot of Democrats, say, that would be a corporate bonanza for ExxonMobil. They would get an extra $4 billion.

Here's the question. Should ExxonMobil be excluded from that cut in the corporate tax rate?

MCCAIN: Oh, of course not. We should -- we should be cutting corporate tax for every business in America.

You know, Barney Frank just said, we're going to take some of that money away from the rich people. That's what Obama is all about. That is what this is about. Let me tell you -- let me tell you, we tried a windfall profit tax back during the days of Jimmy Carter, OK? We tried it. It didn't work.

But the important thing is, if you talk to the CEO of FedEx, Fred Smith, if you talk to the CEO of Cisco, John Chambers, you talk to Meg Whitman, former CEO of eBay, you know what they will tell you? They will tell you, they pay their full 35 percent. And you know what else they will tell you? When they have the ability to go overseas, unfortunately, they do go overseas.

And you know why? Because we're paying -- they're paying 35 percent, full-freight, no evasions or escapes from the taxes. They're paying full-freight. And they will show you their tax returns. And guess what? If they go to

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ireland, they're only paying 11 percent. So, where are they going to go where they can create wealth and create jobs? It's simple, fundamental economics.

So, to somehow allege that a company or corporation that can be international is not going to go where they pay the lowest taxes and can create the most jobs is just foolishness. The last time we practiced this kind of isolationism and protectionism that Senator Obama espouses and higher taxes was a guy named Herbert Hoover.

BLITZER: We have another question from a viewer, Frederick Allier (ph) of Doylestown, Pennsylvania. He says he's an independent. Normally, he says, he votes Republican, but he says he lost -- you lost his vote this time because of what he called negative campaigning. Here's his question.

(CROSSTALK)

MCCAIN: Have you got anybody who says they have changed their mind, and they support me?

BLITZER: Yes. Yes, there are.

MCCAIN: You got a question from them, Wolf? I would love to hear that.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Here's -- here's -- here's his question.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: My question to you is about tax cuts. How can you explain to the American people that tax cuts are going to solve our economic issues, might it be for the rich or the poor, whomever it is for, when they really haven't worked for the last eight years?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: All I can say to him is that, look at history. Look at history.

You raise taxes during economic crisis times, as we did in -- in -- back in the time of Herbert Hoover, you send the country into a depression. I'm not going to do that.

We have a fundamental difference of opinion. Some people think you have got to spread the wealth around. You have got to raise taxes. As I said, Barney Frank and others said, we're going to get those rich people and we're going to take the money from them? Fine, if that's what they want to do.

And I can hardly -- it's -- it's incredible to think of Speaker Pelosi, Harry Reid and Barack Obama with the tax-and-spend policies that they did in the past and that they espouse now and might happen in the future. It invigorates me to keep my campaign going, and going hard. I don't want that to happen to America.

BLITZER: Social Security, it's a potential problem out there for our children and grandchildren.

MCCAIN: Sure.

BLITZER: And you have said, nothing is off the table as far as coming up with some solutions, long-term solutions, to Social Security.

(CROSSTALK)

MCCAIN: That's the way you negotiate, and that's the way you negotiate and get solutions.

BLITZER: Right now, there's a cap at $102,000 for Social Security payroll withholding tax. Are you open, as part of an effort to save Social Security, to letting that -- that cap go up?

MCCAIN: I'm obviously against it. And I want to tell you again, the way you succeed in negotiations -- and I have done it many times across the aisle, whether it be Ted Kennedy, or Russ Feingold, or Joe Lieberman, or -- or anybody else -- is, you sit down and you negotiate.

You go in with your negotiating positions. I will go in with my negotiating oppositions. My position is that I won't raise taxes on anybody.

BLITZER: What about increasing the retirement age from 65?

MCCAIN: I am going in that I won't -- I will have -- there are things on the table we will negotiate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ronald Reagan, Tip O'Neill, 1983, went in, negotiated, and came out and saved Social Security. Guess what? That's what the American people want from us. That's what I have done all the time I have been in the Congress of the United States.

And -- and -- and, so, for me to say that anything, but I'm going to do what I saw two great leaders, Tip O'Neill and Ronald Reagan, do is -- it's just foolishness.

BLITZER: So, raising the retirement age..

MCCAIN: The Democrats -- the Democrats insist -- the reason why we couldn't -- couldn't get agreement in 2005 is because the Democrats insisted, as a precondition, that we raise taxes.

So, guess what? We never sat down at the table together. The Americans want us to sit down together, Wolf. And, so, all I can tell is, I will sit down with them. I have worked with them before. I will sit across the table from them.

I'm against tax increases. I'm against a lot of the bad things that -- that -- that a lot of the people support. But I will get a result, and we will save Social Security.

BLITZER: And how do you feel about raising the retirement age?

MCCAIN: I feel very strongly that I will sit down with the Democrats, and we will negotiate out something that will save Social Security, because that's our obligation to future generations of Americans. And you can ask me, you know, for the next half-hour, if you would like.

BLITZER: All right.

MCCAIN: I mean, that would be kind of fun. And my answer is going to be the same. I will sit down and negotiate, the way have I done in the past, which Senator Obama has never done, whether it be in judicial nominations, or whether it be in immigration reform, or ethics or lobbying reform. He always went home to the Democrat leadership.

BLITZER: Let's talk a little bit about your support -- and correct me if I'm wrong -- you did support President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security and allow Social Security recipients to use about 10 percent of their Social Security savings in the stock market. That collapsed, obviously. It didn't go forward. Knowing what we know now about the volatility of the stock market, is that still a good idea?

MCCAIN: The reason why the talks collapsed is because the Democrats insisted on agreeing to tax increases before we sat down. So, let's -- let's -- let's understand history.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: What about private Social Security...

(CROSSTALK)

MCCAIN: OK. That's what they wanted to do.

BLITZER: ... investments in the stock market?

MCCAIN: And all this other stuff was -- was worth negotiating.

And I will protect, as president of the United States, the Social Security benefits of retirees and future retirees. I will protect those benefits and I will do whatever is necessary to protect those benefits. And I have said that time over time.

Every -- every even-numbered year, the Democrats run out, scare the senior citizens, say, they're going to raise your taxes, they're going to destroy Social Security -- same old stuff. I have seen it for, oh, so -- more years than I can count.

I'm not scaring any senior. I'm going to preserve their -- and protect their Social Security benefits, despite what ads may be run, and the senior citizens, as well as all citizens in this country.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And the notion of a 10 percent, using 10 percent in the stock market?

MCCAIN: They know me about -- about how I'm going to fix Social Security, and I'm going to make their Social Security the best I can, and we will preserve the benefits that they have, and I will protect Social Security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: And the 10 percent?

MCCAIN: And I will protect Social Security.

BLITZER: All right.

MCCAIN: And I will sit down at the table with the Democrats. And, by the way, we can keep -- you know, this is -- I will give you this -- this is -- I'm telling you, I'm going to protect Social Security.

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: All right.

MCCAIN: And that's what I have done my entire career. And I will do what Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill did. And that is save Social Security and make Americans aware that, unfortunately, present- day retirees are -- have -- working Americans today are not going to receive the same benefits as present-day retirees, unless we fix it. Now, I think I can do it, convince the American people that we will sit down together.

BLITZER: Let's move on and talk about national security.

MCCAIN: Good.

BLITZER: If you're elected president, of the United States, do you believe America's enemies, whether terrorists or hostile governments, would test you during the first six months of your presidency?

MCCAIN: I've already been tested. And I'm astonished and amazed to hear Senator Obama pre -- Senator Biden predict that the untried, untested President Obama will be tested by our enemies. And we may not agree -- his own backers may not agree.

Look, I've been tested. Senator Biden referred to the Cuban missile crisis. I was there. We came that close, as historians say, to a nuclear exchange.

Senator Biden expects his own running mate, expects Senator Obama to be tested in that way?

I mean that's a remarkable statement.

BLITZER: Because usually (INAUDIBLE)...

MCCAIN: That should concern all Americans.

BLITZER: ...they are tested early on by hostile powers out there.

MCCAIN: They know I've been tested. They know I've been tested. I've been tested many times.

BLITZER: The U.S. -- the Bush administration...

MCCAIN: And the thing that probably may encourage them a little is that Senator Obama has been wrong. He was wrong about the surge in Iraq. He still fails to acknowledge that he was wrong. I mean remarkable.

He was wrong when he said the Georgians should show restraint. He was wrong when he said he would sit down across the table from Ahmadinejad, Chavez and the Castro brothers. He was wrong about those.

So I can understand why the American people might be concerned, particularly when his own running mate says he's going to be tested.

BLITZER: All right...

MCCAIN: I've been tested, my friend.

BLITZER: We've got a limited amount of time, so I just want to get a couple of things in before I let you go. Iraq, a very important issue.

MCCAIN: Sure.

BLITZER: Right now, we still 140,000, 150,000 troops in Iraq. The Bush administration seems to be close to what's called a Status of Forces Agreement with the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri Al- Maliki. It calls, in the draft agreement, at least, for complete withdrawal of forces from villages and cities by July 30th of 2009 and out of the country by December 31st 2011.

If you're elected president, would you, as commander-in-chief, honor this agreement if, in fact, it's formalized?

MCCAIN: Well, with respect, Wolf -- and you know better, my friend. You know better. It's condition-based. It's conditions-based. And Ryan Crocker, our ambassador in Baghdad, said if you want to know what victory looks like, look at this agreement. So you know better than that, Wolf. You know it's condition-based. And that's what the big fight was all about.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: So you accept this -- what's on the table right now

MCCAIN: I've always said we would be out based on conditions and honor in victory and not defeat. And it's very clear to any observer now that if we would have done what Senator Biden wanted to do -- break Iraq up into three countries -- if we'd have done what Senator Obama to do, which was immediate withdrawal and setting firm dates for it, we'd have probably been defeated in Iraq.

And the problem there is we would have had increased Iranian influence. We'd have had sectarian violence on the increase. And probably we would have had to go back.

So it's a big -- a big issue, a big issue for the American people. And I understand why it's not on the front pages or the lead in CNN, because we have a relatively secure environment that's getting more secure.

BLITZER: Colin Powell was pretty biting in his criticism. He said you were a little unsure of how to deal with the economic crisis. You seem to have, he said, a different approach every day. He sensed you didn't have a complete grasp of the economic crisis the American people are going through right now.

I wonder if you'd like to respond to Secretary Powell.

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R-AZ), PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: I respect General Powell. But I respectfully disagree. I especially disagree when he said -- the comments that he made about Governor Palin, the most popular governor in America, a governor who knows energy issue, a $40 billion pipeline reformer, took on the governor of her own party. And I hope that sometime General Powell will take time out of his busy schedule to meet with her. I know she'd be pleased to meet with him.

Highlight #2

Brian Williams Interviews John McCain and Sarah Palin (NBC 10/22/08 06:36pm)

BRIAN WILLIAMS: Senator, I will begin with your observation on the tarmac. You came in today, there is not one, but two planes with your name on the side. You immediately started reminiscing about the depth of New Hampshire, you and your garment bag coming off the commercial flight. So here you are, you are down, you are down in money. How do you stay up?

MCCAIN: Down in money. Down in the polls. We got them just where we want them.

WILLIAMS: What do you mean by that?

MCCAIN: I mean that's when we do best, really, Brian. I have always done best when we are running a little bit behind and got to catch up. That somehow I have been very blessed. We seem to catch fire and lately we have seen in the last several days, week, ever since the debate we have seen some uptick and we have three, four points to go and we can win this thing. >>

WILLIAMS: Did this campaign get out of your control? Here's what I mean -- a lot of people who know you well saw you take that microphone from that woman in Wisconsin and for the first time in a long time they said, there, that's john McCain.

MCCAIN: Brian, they either haven't been paying attention or don't want to. In my speech at the convention, I spoke of my admiration for senator Obama, the fact that he had motivated so many people. I have said continuously, my respect for him. That doesn't change my view that there are stark differences. When I am president there is not going to be an international crisis that he can -- that senator Biden can guarantee. I am not going to raise people's taxes in a bad economy. Look, we have got very big differences. But I have always been respectful of senator Obama. And he is now spending more money than any campaign in American history on negative ads against me. That's fine. The American people are paying attention.

WILLIAMS: You mention senator Biden's comment the other day about, a new president and a test of the new president's mettle, one of your closest friends in the senate, Joe Lieberman said on face the nation, our enemies will test the new president early. And it has happened throughout modern history.

MCCAIN: Well, look -- I have been tested. They know me, they know me very well. I have been tested. Senator Biden said it. What if Sarah or I had said it? Oh, my god, it would have been terrible. Imagine. His own running mate said it's because he is young and new and untested. That's why senator Biden said mark my word, mark my words, what he said, there is going to be an international crisis. And then he compared it to the Cuban missile crisis. My friend I was in the Cuban missile crisis. I was on the aircraft carrier "enterprise" in the ware wing. We were close to nuclear war. I wouldn't predict that. That is remarkable. When a vice presidential candidate predicts because a young untested president is going to face an international crisis like the Cuban missile crisis. Unbelievable. Americans know I have been tested.

BRIAN WILLIAMS: [Governor Palin], yesterday you tied this notion of an early test to a new president to this notion of preconditions that you both have been hammering the Obama campaign on. First of all what in your mind is a precondition?

SARAH PALIN: You have to have some, diplomatic strategy going into a meeting with some one like Ahmadinejad or Kim Jung Il . . . that would seek to destroy America or our allies. It is so naive and so dangerous . . . to proclaim they would be willing to sit down with a leader like Ahmadinejad and just talk about the problems, the issues that are facing them. So that is some ill-preparedness right there. But following up with your comment about Biden also, when Biden, what he had done the other night to his Democrat donors in talking to them in a fund raiser, warning mark my word there will be an international crisis if Barack Obama is elected, he was confirming what he had been saying all along in the primary race. He had warned voters that Barack was not prepared yet to be president. And that the presidency is not a place for on the job training.

WILLIAMS: When he says the new president will be tested though, I am missing how that is different from senator Lieberman saying, quote, "our enemies will test the new president early. "

JOHN MCCAIN: Look, I don't know when Joe Lieberman said that. Joe Lieberman is supporting me. The main reason, probably, he thinks America will be safer and more secure with me as president. Otherwise he wouldn't have crossed party lines and come over almost unprecedented and support my candidacy. So I don't know exactly what Joe Lieberman was saying, but I know that Joe Lieberman is convinced that this country and this world will be a lot safer place with me president. If he thought there was some kind of equivalency, he probably would have stayed in his own party as far as which nominee he supported. But I want to go back again to Sarah's point. And that is -- that we now have a guarantee, saying because he is young and untested, that's what part of senator Biden's rant was and because he was young and untested and . . . then Senator Obama will probably do what the donors don't agree with. This is probably one of those moments in American political history that stands out. And I think the American people are going to pay attention.

PALIN: I think it is the most telling comment that has been made yet on this campaign trail in all of these months. I think that has been the most significant comment, that is my personal opinion on this. For Biden too, to have been the one to say he would be so honored to run on a McCain ticket because he knew that way if Senator McCain is elected president that our country would be better off. I think there is significance there too in the comment made.

WILLIAMS: Let me ask you both about what must have been a hurtful Sunday for you especially, you Senator McCain, Colin Powell's endorsement of Barack Obama and Governor, respectfully, the heart of his quote, about Governor Palin, Senator McCain, "I don't believe she is ready to be president of the United States which is the job of vice president. And so that raised some question in my mind as to the judgment that Senator McCain made." When you heard those words from a man you have known for a long time, what was your reaction, saying basically we have little to judge these future leaders on except for the big decision of picking a running mate?

MCCAIN: I know that if General Powell had wanted to meet Governor Palin we could have arranged that easily number one. Number two is then obviously General Powell does not know governor Palin's record. Reform, governor, 24,000 employees I believe of the state of Alaska, negotiated a $40 billion natural gas pipeline by taking on the oil and gas interests, took on the governor of her own party who is incumbent. Stood up against corruption, cut taxes, gave her constituents money back, shares my world view, has frankly in all due respect, a son, who has got his life on the line right now in defense of freedom, and that's not qualified? Tell me what is qualified? I am overjoyed to have a person who is a real reformer. What Americans want right now more than anything else they want us to reform the way we do business in Washington and they want our economy put back on track. Here's a proven record. And so, all I can say is, I see all these attacks on governor Palin. I don't live in a bubble. But those people obviously, are either not paying attention to, or don't care about the record of the most popular governor in the United States of America.

PALIN: And, look, let me interrupt . . . I am not going to toot my own horn but I have more executive experience than even Barack Obama has, dealing with multibillion dollar budgets, thousand of employees in position as mayor, manager, regulator of oil and gas, and governor. Let's not forget in this context of one endorsement, of, um Senator, um-- Colin Powell's, that you have received the endorsement of at least four former secretaries of state and hundreds--

MCCAIN: Five secretary, former secretaries of states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PALIN: Five! And hundreds of retired top US brass and US military brass that see also in John McCain the ability to win the wars and to keep our nation safe and of course, those who are in more economic minded also who is endorsing John McCain because they know too that he will get our economy back on track. He will reduce taxes on our small businesses and on our families so that we can keep more of what we produce and earn so we can hire more people as business owners. That's how jobs are created. That's how the economy gets rolling. He has got that in him. He has got that in his plan and that's recognized. I am appreciative of the endorsements you have received.

MCCAIN: Kissinger, George Shultz, Larry Eagleburger and Al Hague. All of those have been strong supporters of mine, plus 200 or more retired generals and admirals and mine. I am more proud of that.

McCain Quotes Hoover on Baseball (FNC 10/22/08, ad aired during World Series Coverage)

MICHAEL DOUGLAS: When Depression struck down the roaring '20s, Americans faced a bleak and uncertain future.

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Please glance at them to see if you could use them to inspire or highlight your own work as you have inspired us.

Hello John,

Below is the refined question you just conveyed via phone:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. Increasing sustainable financing and decreasing unsustainable financing will be essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals. That will require applying high environmental and social standards to our investments going forward. China will host the G20 next year in the midst of a growing international dialogue on sustainable investment standards. What is China's strategy for leveraging the G20, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), the South-South Cooperation Fund, the Silk Road Fund, and other bilateral and multilateral forums to help establish common global standards for sustainable financing?

Will hold on sending until I receive either a green light or additional edits.

Background notes of potential interest:

Last Friday Zhang Gaoli attended the St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in Russia and delivered remarks re China's plans for the 2016 G20. His speech was very general but did contain some positive indicators: he said G20 nations should develop new driving forces for sustainable growth of the global economy. He also focused on China's Silk Road initiative, which he welcomed other countries to join. That suggests they are at least thinking about linking these other programs in with G20.

Terminology re China hosting G20: Turkey currently enjoys talking about the fact that they hold the "G20 presidency" but thus far Chinese state press is using the term "chair" instead of presidency.

The 2015 G20 summit will be November 14-15 in Turkey. Then Turkey hands the baton to China. The 2016 summit will be in Hangzhou, China (likely next fall, exact date TBD).

Thanks,

Melanie

Makes sense to combine - and perhaps leading with G20 will draw out some responses about that, too.

- I wonder whether it's useful to nail down any specifics on high quality, e.g. investing in sustainable technologies and services, in ways that comply with high social and governance standards - the downside is the risk of getting too focused on a back and forth on governance, though could be interesting to specify each component to see if he responds to each.
- In the SDG financing world, China's official position is that ODA is still the main vehicle, so may be useful to say something to the effect of "increasing sustainable development financing, including harnessing a broader range of sources towards sustainable development is essential ". (REF recent official Chinese gov position paper on post-2015 which states: "Development financing should be enhanced with North-South cooperation serving as the main channel." This statement is a pure political play, since domestic resources are the main vehicle of SD financing and drove China's own rise, not to mention ODA is not terribly sustainable, but this line plays well with developing countries.) This may be adding too much into a single question, but thought it worthwhile to flag.

Cheers,

Molly

John and team,

Pete combined the G20 questions into one shorter one and added a separate one on finance. Here's some updated suggested text from Pete:

(1) As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. How will China use its G20 presidency next year to drive further progress on these two issues?

(2) Relatedly, increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

I think Pete's finance language is excellent. My one concern is that if we send 2 questions, they might pick what is easiest to respond to rather than what we would find most interesting. One option would be to combine further, perhaps as follows:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. It is in this environment that China is taking on the G20 presidency, and many observers around the world will be watching next year to see how China leverages the G20 to drive further progress on these two issues. Observers will also be monitoring whether and to what degree China leverages the AIIB to achieve these important goals. Increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

Re: Quick Response Needed – Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

Date: June 19, 2015

You are attending the China Center for International Economic Exchanges (CCIEE) think tank summit in Beijing June 26-27. There will be a side meeting with Li Keqiang. Around 40 guest scholars and officials will attend. You are one of the high-level conference speakers invited to attend the Li Keqiang meeting. You have also been invited to ask Premier Li a question. In that meeting only four people will ask questions (yourself included). CCIEE tells us the questions must be submitted in advance, no later than Monday evening (June 22) U.S. time. We should treat this as a hard deadline.

We suggest posing the following question:

Next year China will host the G20. Many nations around the world will be watching to see how China handles its G20 presidency and what that tells us about how China's rise will impact multilateral institutions. What does the Chinese government currently consider to be its top priorities for China's 2016 G20 presidency? As you know, 2015 is a very big year for sustainable development and climate change. We hope to see big progress this year on the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Goals and at the UNFCCC Conference of the Parties in Paris. Is the Chinese leadership thinking about how China can use its G20 presidency to unify and strengthen G20 support for implementing multilateral agendas on sustainable development and climate change?

Please share your thoughts asap (and no later than Monday evening) so that we can pass your preferred question on to Premier Li's team.

Additional meeting details below.

I. Meeting Format

Li will lead the meeting and do most of the talking. He has selected four people, including you, to ask questions. There is no pre-set theme for the meeting, but we have been told you are welcome to ask questions on topics including sustainable development, think tank cooperation, and economic issues.

II. Potential Participants

The meeting hosts have invited about 40 guest scholars and officials to attend the meeting. That group includes:

From 2008-2013, he was vice premier of the State Council and deputy secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. In this role, he oversaw a portfolio of issues including economic development, price controls, finance, climate change, and macroeconomic management. During that time, he also directed the Three Gorges Project Construction Committee and of South-to-North Water Diversion Construction Project Committee. In 2013, he became Premier of the State Council. He has focused on economic development and meeting China's growth targets. He has also led efforts to set targets for reducing energy intensity, cap coal use, and boost renewable capacity. At a meeting of the National Leading Group on Climate Change on June 12, 2015, he backed China's commitments through the UNFCCC, stating "China stands ready to work with all other parties to ensure a comprehensive, balanced and strong agreement at the upcoming Paris Conference."

John and Susan -- I know this is something you both care about. (I mean, not the terrorism, the personnel issue.) I just want to make sure that you give serious consideration to two guys I know well and think very, very highly of.

Graham Alison, former dean of the Kennedy School, has cared about the issue passionately for 25 years. Written a lot. Serves now on a Congressional Commission that's looking at the issue, so he's quite on top of the current situation. Has spoken with Obama about it in the past, etc. Known to Biden. I'm not sure Graham wants to go into government, but I hope so.

Michael Nacht just stepped down as dean of Berkeley's policy school, and before that was dean at Maryland and a researcher at Harvard. Was an Asst Director in ACDA ages ago. Still active on committees and commissions, and writing. Very broadly knowledgable about terrorism, prliferation, etc.

As I recall, there was a campaign pledge, consistent with a statute, to create within the NSC a coordinator on nuclear security. Either of these guys would be terrific. And I suppose there are appropriate sub-cabinet national security jobs, too.

Subject: John McCain: A Third Term for the Bush Agenda

Date: June 6, 2008

As the general election begins, we expect a renewed focus on Sen. John McCain's policy platform. McCain is advocating a radically conservative agenda that is largely indistinguishable from the failed policies of President George W. Bush. We expect an intense debate over these ideas and the direction of our country. We provide the following information in the hope that it will be helpful to you in your upcoming public appearances, town hall meetings, and media interviews.

In recent conversations with journalists and commentators, we have been repeatedly confronted with the same myths about McCain. The misperception persists that he is a maverick that proposes moderate policies, no matter how conservative his actual agenda is. He has an opportunity to make deep inroads into key voter groups like independent voters, women, and working-class families. He is "a different kind of Republican."

The facts do not bear this out, however. The truth is that a McCain presidency is likely to be a third term for President Bush's policies. On the major issues of today, McCain has either been aligned closely with Bush or he has renounced his past positions and is now aligned closely with Bush. He claims to have differences with the president on certain key issues, but in fact the two men's current positions on these issues are very similar. American voters are beginning to see McCain's policies for what they are: 64 percent of voters say that McCain will continue Bush policies or adopt even more conservative policies.[1] Even the slogan "a different kind of Republican" is recycled from Bush.[2]

1. On the Big Issues, McCain Agrees with Bush

McCain professes to disagree with Bush on some issues, but not on the biggest issues. On the most important issues facing our country—the war in Iraq, the economy, and health care—McCain's policies are "virtually indistinguishable" from Bush's approach.[3]

The War in Iraq

Like Bush, McCain is committed to continuing an endless war in Iraq. While Bush says the war in Iraq could last 40 years, McCain has said that he is willing to stay for 100. When Bush was pumping false intelligence to the public before the war, McCain was a reliable echo. When Dick Cheney and Paul Wolfowitz said we'd be greeted as liberators, McCain said the same. When Bush urged "stay the course" in Iraq, McCain followed. When Bush recommended a troop surge, McCain was the foremost supporter (see additional information on McCain's record supporting Bush's strategy in Iraq below).

McCain has said "no one has supported President Bush on Iraq more than I have." Exactly right. And he will pursue Bush's agenda of a long-term military presence in Iraq, regardless of the increasing regional threats and the escalating financial and human costs of this war. This is the wrong approach for our country.

The Economy

With gas prices near $4 a gallon, McCain's answer to our energy problems is nearly $4 billion a year in tax cuts for the five biggest American oil companies.[4] More than half of his new tax cuts—$170 billion a year—would go to corporations.

Like Bush, McCain has made massive tax cuts the centerpiece of his economic agenda.[5] McCain once opposed the Bush tax cuts as unfair to the middle class and too expensive in a time of war. Now, however, he has taken the opposite extreme, embracing the permanent extension of Bush's tax cuts and proposing an additional $300 billion a year in tax cuts. McCain's plan would essentially double the size of the Bush tax cuts, and the top 1 percent of taxpayers will get an even larger share of McCain's new tax cuts than they did of Bush's cuts. As progressives, we oppose this unwise and unfair tax policy.

McCain opposes helping communities purchase homes in foreclosure, a step that would protect neighboring properties from a sudden drop in value, eliminating home equity and possibly causing a vicious cycle of foreclosures.[6] His foreclosure plan would reach only 200,000 to 400,000 borrowers by his campaign's own optimistic estimate, a number that is far smaller than what is needed and explicitly excludes victims of predatory lending.

Health Care

McCain is campaigning on a health care plan that envisions a radical transformation of our health care system.[7] It envisions a system where most Americans shop for health insurance on their own in a highly deregulated market. It reforms the tax treatment of health insurance to promote individual insurance rather than job-based health benefits, and it makes it difficult for states to ensure minimal consumer protections on insurance plans. Tens of millions of Americans with preexisting conditions, such as cancer and diabetes, are likely to find coverage much more difficult to find and expensive to afford.
The McCain plan is also radical in another way: It envisions insurance plans that require greater deductibles and copayments that encourage patients to act more like "consumers." In other words, it will make health care more expensive in the hopes that patients will use less of it. However, studies show that higher costs lead families to avoid necessary care as well as wasteful care. In particular, higher costs undermine effective preventive care and care for chronic diseases that can bring down overall health care costs.
The McCain plan closely resembles a deeply unpopular proposal Bush unveiled in his 2007 budget.[8] Lawmakers were right to reject that plan, which failed to even earn a hearing on Capitol Hill.

Judges

McCain has pledged to appoint "clones of Alito and Roberts" to the Supreme Court.[9] In his address on his judicial philosophy, he declared that "Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito meet [my] standards in every respect."[10]

McCain has also promised to appoint "strict constructionists."[11] He adds, "I happen to view life to begin at conception, and that is a moral belief I have. And, therefore, I think that Roe v. Wade was not only a bad decision but a flawed decision."[12]

It is important to remember that his appointments would not be limited to the Supreme Court. He would make dozens of selections for lower courts as well. His appointments will have a decisive effect on the federal courts, and progressives should oppose their confirmation. .

2. McCain's Claimed Differences from Bush Are Minor

In a speech earlier this week, McCain cited four other areas where he differed from Bush: the conduct of the war in Iraq, climate change and energy policy, government spending, and the treatment of the detainees.[13] In each of these areas, however, McCain's positions look much more like Bush than different from him.

War in Iraq

McCain claims to have been the administration's "greatest critic" in the war's first few years.[14] In fact, McCain was one of the staunchest defenders of the administration's war strategy. In March 2003—the month the invasion began—McCain said he had "no qualms about our strategic plans."[15] He believed that the Bush administration had "an appropriate strategy."[16] In 2004, he remained "confident we're on the right course."[17] In 2005, he still believed that troop levels were adequate: "I think we have in numbers [sic] probably enough."[18]

McCain repeatedly predicted the success of Bush's approach. Like Cheney, Wolfowitz, and others, he predicted that "the Iraqi people will greet us as liberators."[19] In 2003, he said "I believe the war in Iraq can be concluded successfully in a relatively brief time."[20] In a later appearance on "Meet the Press," he said "I believe that this conflict is still going to be relatively short."[[21] In April 2003, he claimed that "the end is very much in sight," and that all that stood in the way would be "a short period of chaos."[22]

McCain repeatedly defended Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. In 2004, he told Sean Hannity and Alan Colmes that he believed Rumsfeld had done a "fine job."[23] In another interview, he said that he was "an admirer of Secretary Rumsfeld."[24]

Climate Change and Energy Policy

McCain is no longer a leader on climate change. Despite cosponsoring legislation to cap U.S. emissions of greenhouse gases, he is failing to push global warming at a crucial time. Historic legislation that closely resembles his bill is before the Senate this week, and McCain is withholding his support.[25] Bush also opposes this bill.

Like Bush, McCain also supports subsidies for oil companies. Last year, he opposed a measure to shift $13 billion in tax breaks from oil companies to wind, solar, and other renewable energy sources.[26] However, he continues to support billions of dollars in subsidies for the nuclear industry.

Government Spending

McCain argues that he "opposed wasteful spending by both parties and the Bush Administration."[27] However, McCain's promises to cut spending are long on rhetoric and short on programs targeted to cuts—the same approach taken for years by George Bush. [28]

McCain promises to immediately eliminate $100 billion in "wasteful spending and earmarks."[29] This figure relies on a Congressional Research Service report that uses a very broad definition of earmarks that includes foreign aid to countries like Israel, Egypt, and Jordan. The Washington Post called his $100 billion claim "largely fantasy." The Heritage Foundation estimated that, at most, it might be possible to eliminate $9 billion in earmarks.[30] Other than a one-year budget freeze saving $15 billion, McCain has not proposed any other budget savings. Instead, he has only promised to review lists of wasteful spending and to appoint a commission to draw up a new list.[31]

Under America's first 42 presidents, the nation accumulated $3.4 trillion in debt and President Clinton had our country on track to pay off the debt. Bush reversed course and is expected to expand the national debt to $5.4 trillion before leaving office.[32] McCain's proposals to date would raise the debt to a whopping to $12.7 trillion by the end of his second term,[33] which would destroy the value of the dollar and worsen inflation. Progressive should lead the fight toward getting the nation's books in order.

Treatment of the Detainees

After Attorney General Alberto Gonzales claimed that anti-torture laws and treaties did not apply at overseas prisons, McCain sponsored legislation to ban cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees in military custody. However, the law includes a major loophole: a provision authored by Lindsay Graham (R-SC) and supported by McCain that prevents courts from enforcing the law. Moreover, McCain sanctions the CIA use of waterboarding and other harsh interrogation methods.[34]

This morning's New York Times revealed that McCain believes that President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program—which took place outside the laws passed by Congress—was nonetheless lawful.[35] According to the Times, McCain's support for wireless wiretapping contradicts earlier statements that presidents should obey wiretapping statutes.

Immigration

On immigration issues, McCain has broken with Bush—he is now more conservative. McCain once worked with Bush and Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-MA) to champion a comprehensive approach to immigration reform that combined border enforcement with an opportunity for undocumented immigrants to earn citizenship. Now, however, McCain says he "got the message."[36] According to ABC News, "He hasn't exactly renounced the bill he championed in the spring, but he has fine-tuned his position and changed the emphasis to assure the skeptics and critics — and there are many — that dealing with the fate of those already in the country only occurs after the borders are secured."[37]

3. McCain Lacks the Special Appeal He Claims to Have with Key Groups

The conventional wisdom holds that in the current political environment, the "moderate" McCain has a unique opportunity to make gains among demographic groups that supported Senator Hillary Clinton (D-NY), particularly women, Latinos, and the working class. Neither McCain's positions on issues important to these groups nor recent polling data support this idea.

Women

Contrary to the conventional wisdom, McCain's support among women is not strong. In fact, McCain today has less support from women than Bush did in 2004. While Bush won 48 percent of women in 2004, McCain gets support from only 44 percent.[38] McCain's weak support may be related to the fact that McCain is not a moderate on issues important to women.

McCain has opposed efforts to guarantee women equal pay. On April 23, McCain skipped a vote to invoke cloture on the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act. The Associated Press reported that he opposed it "because it would lead to more lawsuits."[39] Asked by a 14-year-old girl about his opposition to equal pay laws, McCain said, "I don't believe that this would do anything to help the rights of women, except maybe help trial lawyers and others in that profession."[40]

McCain has repeatedly opposed federal funding for abortion, even in cases of rape or incest.[41] He joined just 20 other senators in opposing family-planning grants and only 18 others in prohibiting the use of Medicaid dollars for abortions in cases of rape and incest.[42] In 2003, McCain voted for Senator Rick Santorum's bill to ban the so-called "partial-birth abortion" bill, even though the procedure would only be allowed when it is necessary to save a woman's life.[43]

Working Class

Perhaps due to the failures of Bush's economic policies, McCain's support is lagging among working-class voters. Bush won 51 percent of working-class voters in 2004, but McCain has earned the support of only 45 percent of them.

McCain voted against raising the minimum wage at least seven times.[44] During the housing crisis, McCain rejected "activist approaches." He placed the blame on homeowners while supporting the bailout of Bear Stearns.[45]

While working class families are struggling with stagnant wages, higher energy costs, and rising unemployment, McCain told the Boston Globe that "[t]he issue of economics is not something I've understood as well as I should."[46] McCain's tax plan offers little or nothing to middle-class families, while delivering the majority of its benefits to the top 1 percent of taxpayers.[47] One of his top economic advisors, Carly Fiorina, defended the outsourcing of American jobs before receiving a $42 million severance package.[48] It is unclear how working class voters will relate to her circumstances.[49]

Latinos

Hispanics' median family income declined by an average of 0.5 percent per year from 2000 to 2006, after rising in the 1990s.[50] Latinos also have been among those most affected by the economic downturn. The unemployment rate for Hispanics in the United States rose to 6.5 percent in the first quarter of 2008, well above the 4.7 percent rate for all non-Hispanics. The unemployment rate among Latino immigrants was 7.5 percent in the first quarter of this year. Of working-age Latinos, 52.5 percent are immigrants.[51]

The housing crisis is also falling particularly hard on Hispanic households. Many more Hispanics got high-cost mortgages than did whites. Nearly 46 percent of home-purchase loans made to Hispanics in 2006 were high-cost, as opposed to only 18 percent for whites. [52] The crisis is expected to cost Hispanic homeowners between $75 billion and $129 billion.[53]

College education is a particularly important issue for many Hispanic families. McCain has repeatedly voted against additional funding for Pell grants and other forms of student aid.[54]

McCain's ties to Bush policies are likely to hurt him among Latinos. Some 41 percent of Latino registered voters say the policies of the Bush administration have been harmful to Hispanics, while just 16 percent say they have been helpful. McCain's performance among Latinos is 7 points behind that of Bush in 2004.[55] More Latinos give McCain an unfavorable rating than give him a favorable one (32 percent to 25 percent).[56]

Correct The Record Thursday July 10, 2014 Morning Roundup:

"Hard Choices" is a success! Secretary Clinton's book "Hard Choices" remains on track to be one of the bestselling political books of the year, spending its first three weeks at number one on the New York Times' Bestsellers List and now landing at number two in its fourth week. See here.

Headlines:

The Daily Beast: "Hillary's Outside Enforcers Are Led by a Former Foe"

"Some venues say that the job is to write on her once a day, or write on her five times a week or something, which puts a number value on the article, instead of a value of content," said Strider. "I think that deserves a little discussion from the other side. You know it is getting rough when you turn on Morning Joe and they are criticizing themselves for covering Hillary so much."

..."I think it is fair to say that it has always been the case that the media interest in the Clintons seems wide and deep," said Brock. "The right thinks, and there is a history going back 20 years, that the Clintons have been very good for business. They are magnets for money on the Republican and conservative side, and a lot of this anti-Clinton stuff can be seen as a business."

Las Vegas Review-Journal: "UNLV Foundation: Clinton fee pencils out"

"The University of Nevada, Las Vegas Foundation can afford Hillary Clinton's much-debated $225,000 fee to speak at its annual fundraising dinner, having sold out the Oct. 13 event's best tables at $20,000-a-pop."

Gainesville Sun opinion: Douglas Smith, former assistant secretary for the private sector at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security: "International tourism benefits Florida"

"As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton used the tools available to her as America's top diplomat to positively impact the economy here at home, understanding that our economic security was integral to our national security, and vice versa."

Media Matters for America: "MSNBC's Joan Walsh Corrects Mischaracterization Of Clinton's Court-Appointed Defense Work"

"MSNBC political analyst Joan Walsh corrected attempts to cast doubt on the fact that Hillary Clinton served as defense attorney on a decades-old criminal case at the direction of the court, pointing out that, in fact, the judge had compelled Clinton to take the case."

The Daily Caller opinion: Lanny Davis: "Hillary Clinton's 'Hard Choices' Show Who She Really Is"

"What is missing from most of the reviews is what the book reveals about Clinton the person. I can speak to that, knowing her since I was a senior and she was a freshman at Yale Law School when we first met in the fall of 1969."

Time: "Here's What John Kerry Can Learn From Hillary About Israel's New Crisis"

"Just over 18 months later, many of the same dynamics apply as Obama weighs whether Kerry can — or should — broker a deal like the one Clinton struck."

Washington Post column: Harold Meyerson: "Hillary Clinton's identity crisis"

"Which Hillary Clinton would run for — and, more important, govern as — president?"

Slate blog: Weigel: "How Hillary Clinton Went from Working Class Hero to Elite Loser, in Two Bill Kristol Columns"

"One of the great joys of political reporting circa 2014 is how quickly you can crowd-source a question."

Associated Press: APNewsBreak: "Different Attackers In Benghazi?"

"Newly revealed testimony from top military commanders involved in the U.S. response to the Benghazi attacks suggests that the perpetrators of a second, dawn attack on a CIA complex probably were different from those who penetrated the U.S. diplomatic mission the evening before and set it ablaze, killing Ambassador Chris Stevens and another American."

New York Post: Page Six: "Sales figures for Hillary's book continue to plunge"

"According to Nielsen BookScan, Clinton's book sold just 16,000 copies in its most recent week, down from 28,000 a week prior. The title has sold 177,000 in its first month."

U.S. News & World Report blog: The Run 2016: "Joe Biden Heading to Netroots Nation"

"The announcement Wednesday that Vice President Joe Biden is heading to Netroots Nation means that two of the three biggest stars in the Democratic Party will attend the largest gala of progressives in the nation this year. Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, will have a bus visiting in her absence."

Wall Street Journal: "Cuomo Weighs Making Trip to Israel"

"For Mr. Cuomo, who is said to have national political aspirations, such trips could boost his standing among other Democrats jockeying for the 2016 presidential nomination."

Washington Free Beacon: "What They're Saying About the Hillary Tapes"

"Mainstream media members have listened to the tapes uncovered by the Washington Free Beacon of Hillary Clinton laughingly discussing a child rapist she defended in the 1970s, and they've come away rather troubled about how they bode for her 2016 presidential prospects."

The Daily Beast: "Hillary's Outside Enforcers Are Led by a Former Foe"

By David Freedlander

July 10, 2014

[Subtitle:] She's ostensibly not in campaign mode, but a staff of 20 at the outside group Correct the Record is busily working to defend the former secretary of state against right-wing attacks.

On a recent sweltering Wednesday in Washington, D.C., when most of the town had cleared out for the upcoming Fourth of July weekend, Adrienne Elrod was at a desk piled high with books—among them both of Hillary Clinton's memoirs and the 2008 campaign pot-boiler Game Change—emailing with a reporter from BuzzFeed about a small item running later that evening.

Elrod is the communications director for Correct the Record, a six-month-old outfit founded by David Brock, the one-time conservative dirty trickster who in the 1990s turned over a new leaf and started Media Matters, which keeps a watchful eye on the latest talk radio or Fox News outrage. The new group was created to, well, correct the record, particularly the right-wing attacks on Hillary Clinton as she mulls a 2016 presidential run.

The 20 or so staff members at Correct the Record, glued to computers in a loft-like space on Massachusetts Avenue, next to Brock's own office, were engaged that afternoon in pushing back on a narrative emerging that sales of Clinton's latest memoir, Hard Choices, were tanking.

"If we hadn't already seen three articles on this, before the bestseller list was even out, we wouldn't be doing this," said Burns Strider, a genial bear of a Mississippian. He was surrounded by Elrod, an Arkansan and former operative with the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and two other aides who barely looked up from their MacBooks. On the walls around them were photos of Clinton at various periods of her career—looking regal at the State Department, shaggy with Bill in their Yale Law School days.

The idea for CTR came to Brock during the Benghazi hearings on Capitol Hill. With Clinton not there to defend herself, having left her post as secretary of state, the right wing was having a field day, Brock says.

"There was no, or limited, capacity for her to deal with the range of attacks, coming mainly from Capitol Hill but echoed elsewhere," Brock told The Daily Beast. Plus, there were already a half-dozen or so right-wing super PACs that had Clinton in their sights, none more serious than America Rising, an opposition research outfit founded to counter some of Brock's efforts.

That group is run by Tim Miller, a 30-something former aide to Jon Huntsman who, Strider huffed, "must have, like, a Ph.D. in snark." (Indeed, on the PAC's website at the moment are GIFs of George Constanza, The Office, and Mr. Potato Head lifting a dumbbell, each meant to highlight some dunderheaded comment from a Democrat.)

Strider and his team see Miller and America Rising as their dark shadow, if a somewhat unserious one, throwing whatever they can against the wall to see what sticks.

"They throw out stuff, like, 10 times a day. The RNC has a damn squirrel following her around! I mean—they have a squirrel!" Strider said in disbelief, referring to the Republican National Committee intern tasked with stalking Clinton's appearances in a squirrel mascot outfit, wearing a T-shirt that reads, "Another Clinton in the White House is NUTS."

According to Elrod, Correct the Record is trying its best to avoid the kind of flack-on-flack combat that is a hallmark of political campaigns, especially in the era of Twitter and all-night news-athons, preferring to stick to the facts and work by subterfuge.

"We are strategic about how we get our facts out there," she said, pointing out that her group tends to push out its own research to friendly reporters. "A lot of what we do doesn't have our fingerprints on it."

So far, there have been only a few exceptions to that rule. When Miller and America Rising put out a hit on President Clinton for boasting about how he had given away several $550 watches to friends, Correct the Record did respond, noting that the watches came from the Shinola company, a Detroit success story. "So not only were they anti-Clinton, but they were anti-American small business and anti-generosity!" cackled Strider.

And when America Rising put out a surprise e-book on Clinton's time at the State Department, researchers at Correct the Record had, according to Isaac Wright, a Democratic consultant brought on by Brock, "within two hours on a Sundaynight debunked everything they had in that book. That book went nowhere. It quite deservedly landed in the trash."

A bigger question facing the new outfit, however, is how to manage press operations from a non-campaign campaign when Clinton is the best-known figure in American political life—according to a recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, only 1 percent of respondents did not have an opinion about her—and when news outlets have proliferated since she was last approaching a race.

"There is no exact science. The first thing you look at is, is it getting any traction? And we start getting reports on Twitter or Facebook, or other reporters picking it up, and see where is it going," said Strider. "You may still hold off, or you may go balls to the wall for whatever reason."

If something is going to stay in conservative precincts, Correct the Record prefers to keep it there rather than respond and fan the flames further.

"You can almost tell what things she says will get mischaracterized," said Elrod. "You can tell what is going to end up in The Daily Caller, what is going to get picked up by the Free Beacon, and which are going to move more into the mainstream. We try to always have a prepared response, but we wait to see what moves."

Brock and his staff expressed frustration that mainstream outlets, The New York Times chief among them, have dedicated reporters to covering Clinton long before she has announced a potential candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Some venues say that the job is to write on her once a day, or write on her five times a week or something, which puts a number value on the article, instead of a value of content,” said Strider. “I think that deserves a little discussion from the other side. You know it is getting rough when you turn on Morning Joe and they are criticizing themselves for covering Hillary so much.”

Part of the point of Correct the Record is to make sure that Democrats don’t get caught flat-footed the way they did in 2004. Then, long before the days of super PACs, wealthy Republicans funded ads that questioned John Kerry’s war record. At the time, the attacks seemed absurd to Democrats; the Massachusetts senator was a decorated Vietnam veteran, and George W. Bush’s service record was spotty at best.

“I think Democrats to this day tend to have Swift Boaters right over our shoulder,” said Strider. “We tend to worry. We saw what happened to Senator Kerry, and while it was happening, everyone thought, This can’t work. This guy’s got medals. Well, they had a free ride for a good long while before there was an honest-to-God response. I think on some level Democrats think of that and say, ‘Never again.’”

If Kerry got it bad in 2004, Obama in 2008, with his funny name and exotic upbringing, surely had it far worse. That year, the campaign devoted a significant part of its outreach to a “Fight the Smears” effort to beat back rumors that their candidate was Muslim or born in another country. And even though a British tabloid occasionally picks up a story about Obama’s divorce or has some anonymous first-person account of his cocaine habit, no American political figure has undergone quite the onslaught that Clinton has in her nearly three decades on the national scene.

“I think it is fair to say that it has always been the case that the media interest in the Clintons seems wide and deep,” said Brock. “The right thinks, and there is a history going back 20 years, that the Clintons have been very good for business. They are magnets for money on the Republican and conservative side, and a lot of this anti-Clinton stuff can be seen as a business.”

Recently, staffers at Correct the Record have been surprised to discover that the stories they need to push back on are not about Clinton’s book tour, or her time as secretary of state, or even her stint in the U.S. Senate, but her time as first lady, or even more surprisingly, her time as first lady of Arkansas, if not before.

When the Free Beacon discovered diaries of the late Clinton friend Diane Blair that revealed Clinton’s thoughts during the Monica Lewinsky scandal, the CTR staff thought it was old news but still flew someone down to Little Rock the next day. By that evening, their staffer was poring through the files at the University of Arkansas. When an uproar arose more recently over Clinton’s role as a public defender in a Little Rock rape case, the group helped arrange interviews with Mahlon Gibson, the prosecutor in the case whom Elrod and Brock knew from their Arkansas days. Gibson told CNN and others that Clinton was appointed to the case and expressed reservations about it at the time.

Such retread stories from the past, they say, do not worry them.

“When [Kentucky Sen.] Rand [Paul] cranks up his old hits from the ’70s, it is such a waste of time,” said Burns. “Certainly those events helped shape the character of the people we all are today, but you know, the people who remember it aren’t interested in reliving it. I remember the last night of disco. People burned that damn stadium down…Campaigns are about the future. It is all they have, so they are working it.

“Sometimes when somebody brings up one of [the scandals of the past], you see all the old hands come out of the woodwork. I mean, good lord. What is that woman’s name—Maureen Dowd? Peggy Noonan. It’s like they want to get one more shot at their glory years in their 40s, and they are all going at it again, all giddy.”

But if a well-turned phrase by Dowd or Noonan can no longer set tongues wagging like it did in the ’90s the ability of rapid responders to punch back is equally limited. In the last 24 hours, 365 news articles were devoted to Hillary Clinton, according to Google. There have been dozens of tweets just in the last few minutes, including, “Perhaps Hillary Clinton should have thought about who her husband was before naming her book ‘Hard Choices…’ Just sayin…” and “Name 1 thing Hillary Clinton has ever accomplished? As 1st lady? As Senator? As Secretary of State? You CAN’T! She has accomplished nothing!” Never mind whatever podcast, Vine, Tumblr, talk radio host or triple digit cable network is spouting off about at the moment.

How can any one response team keep up? And, for that matter, why should they?

“In the old days, rapid response meant you convince NBC or whomever that the story was bogus and don’t run it,” said Paul Begala, a Brock ally (and former Daily Beast columnist) running his own super PAC. “In this citizen journalism age, you can’t do that anymore. Somebody is going to run it anyway. All you can do is push back with the facts. I can come up with the hyperbole, don’t worry about that, but give me the facts and the data and the quote in context.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Begala, who was chief strategist for the 1992 Clinton-Gore campaign, sees it, the impetus behind the conservative attacks on Hillary Clinton now is not so much to change perceptions about her, since she is so well-known, but to drive down enthusiasm. If there is an idea afoot that Clinton is soft on rapists, for example, then maybe key parts of her coalition, like young women, will stay home.

Some Democratic communicators told The Daily Beast that they thought Correct the Record's time would be better spent on offense. With the group's resources, it could track what the top GOP 2016 contenders were doing, much as its bête noire, America Rising, is doing to Clinton, and pull out embarrassing comments made when Paul, Ted Cruz, and others think no one is really listening.

And the very idea that the Clintons already have a group pushing back on negative stories about them plays into one of the persistent themes of Clinton-world—that they are too sensitive to slights and press criticism, and so need an outside entity to defend them even during an ostensible non-campaign period. It was Hillary Clinton, after all, who invented the modern day campaign war room back in 1992, Begala said.

Brock, naturally, disputes this point.

"To the extent that there is a sensitivity, it is almost a wholly warranted sensitivity," he said. "I would say someone could write a book about the unfair treatment of the Clintons, but I already did."

But the main question facing Correct the Record is what becomes of it once Clinton embarks on a full-scale campaign. In the era of super PACs, almost everything a campaign does can be outsourced—get out the vote drives, advertising, and the like. Keeping a rapid response operation offsite could double its firepower, or it could mean two entities tripping over each other, adding to the noise.

"This is kind of a new chapter being written about how it is being done," said Strider. "It's death-defying. You are either writing a whole new chapter on how to win, or you know, you blew it."

Las Vegas Review-Journal: "UNLV Foundation: Clinton fee pencils out"

By Laura Myers

July 9, 2014, 9:37 p.m. EDT

The University of Nevada, Las Vegas Foundation can afford Hillary Clinton's much-debated $225,000 fee to speak at its annual fundraising dinner, having sold out the Oct. 13 event's best tables at $20,000-a-pop.

The foundation has already sold $353,000 in high-dollar seats and expects to make a profit from the event at Bellagio for only the third time in its history, UNLV spokesman Tony Allen said Wednesday.

The first profitable dinner was in 2012, when Clinton's husband, President Bill Clinton, was paid $250,000 to address a record crowd of 992 people, clearing a total of $75,998, according to figures released by the university. Last year talk show host Charlie Rose was paid $141,700 to speak at the dinner, which earned a $68,335 profit.

The UNLV Foundation launched the annual fundraiser in 1989 but didn't start charging to attend the event until 2010, when David Gergen, a former adviser to Bill Clinton and three previous presidents, spoke for $55,000. The dinner lost $93,289 after expenses, however.

The most expensive dinner was in 2005, when the nonprofit foundation spent $319,435 for 482 attendees to kick off a $500 million fundraising campaign. Over the years, the foundation has raised more than $1 billion for the university.

Allen said foundation leaders in recent years realized the value of selling pricey tables for 10 with special access to speakers.

“The foundation changed the business model for the donor recognition event in 2010 to a paid dinner, which has helped the foundation cover its event costs and in recent years raise money to support the work of the foundation,” Allen said in an email. “Previously, the annual dinner was complimentary to attendees and budgeted and paid for by the foundation.”

Asked whether the foundation expected the fall event with Clinton to be profitable, Allen said, “Yes, we anticipate the donor recognition dinner will cover event costs and generate a net profit.”

Hillary Clinton’s six-figure fee stirred controversy with critics complaining that it’s too large, especially because she’s speaking to an educational group. Timing is also an issue. The $225,000 fee got extra attention because of gaffes the former secretary of state made while on tour to promote her new book, “Hard Choices.”

The potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidate said she was “not truly well off.” She also said the Clintons were “dead broke” when they left the White House in 2001. The couple has earn more than $100 million, much of it from speaking fees, in the past eight years, according to Politico.

David Damore, a political science professor at UNLV, said Hillary Clinton is under a microscope.

“She’s so high-profile that anything she does is going to draw the partisans out,” he said. “And the optics weren’t great.”

Clinton’s supporters note that her speaking fees from universities go to the Bill, Hillary &Chelsea Clinton Foundation, a charitable organization that deals with a range of issues, from global warming to economic growth.

Controversial or not, Clinton is looking like a good investment.

So far, all $20,000 tables ($18,000 tax deductible) have sold out, according to the foundation’s website. All confirmed 16 “world” tables were reserved. Those tickets include a photo session with Clinton and autographed copies of her book as well as “premium wines, champagne and special menu for guests.”

Three $10,000 tables have also been sold, as has one $3,000 table. There were no takers for a $5,000 table as ofWednesday afternoon, Allen said. The total tables sold so far adds up to $353,000.

Individual tickets at $200 a pop aren’t available for sale until August, according to the foundation. Allen said it’s too soon to say how many people will attend the dinner or how much it will cost because “it’s still in the planning stages.”

The Clinton dinner has created a division among UNLV’s student leaders, too.

Last week, Student Body President Elias Bejjelloun and Daniel Waqar, public relations director for the student government, co-signed a letter to the Clinton Foundation, suggesting she donate all or part of her fee to the university as a charitable gesture. The students were careful to praise Clinton and say they looked forward to her speaking at UNLV.

This week, UNLV Sen. Alex Murdock objected and on Tuesday mailed his own letter to the Clinton Foundation, apologizing for what he called an “inappropriate and embarrassing request” by Bejjelloun.

“The request made by the CSUN Student Body President was not only in poor taste, it was also misinformed and not indicative of the intelligence of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

UNLV Students," Murdock wrote.

Murdock also trashed Bejjelloun, saying his ascent to the presidency this year violated bylaws and the student government constitution. The two men have clashed since Murdock challenged Bejjelloun's election, which was upheld.

Murdock said Wednesday he thought Bejjelloun should have consulted with all UNLV student senators before writing the Clinton Foundation. He also noted that the event will make money, so the high fee is worth it.

"You have to spend money to make money," Murdock said.

Bejjelloun stood by his actions, saying Wednesday that he wanted to send out a timely request after Clinton's fee was revealed. He also said he consulted with other senators who were on campus. Murdock, a Navy reservist who served in Iraq, said he was involved in special military training at the time and wasn't asked.

Bejjelloun was unsympathetic.

"If Murdock wanted to be consulted he should come into the office and do his job. He's never here," he said.

Gainesville Sun opinion: Douglas Smith, former assistant secretary for the private sector at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security: "International tourism benefits Florida"

By Douglas Smith

July 7, 2014, 3:52 p.m. EDT

The Washington Economics Group recently released its quarterly report, which shows that tourism and recreation spending in Florida increased 6.4 percent from the same quarter last year. On the report, WEG principal and founder Tony Villamil said that the growth is "a sign of a sustainable economic recovery led by tourism and investment spending." In Florida, and other areas throughout the country, tourism has been a large driver on the road to economic recovery.

The money spent by foreign tourists fuels economic growth and supports hundreds of thousands of American jobs. According to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, "For every 65 international visitors, one American job is created." In Florida, international tourism is vital to the state's economy. The most recent data from the Department of Commerce ranks Florida as the second highest destination for international visitors to the United States.

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton used the tools available to her as America's top diplomat to positively impact the economy here at home, understanding that our economic security was integral to our national security, and vice versa. In her book, "Hard Choices," she writes about "how a collapsing economy in Athens, Greece, affects businesses in Athens, Georgia [and] how a revolution in Cairo, Egypt, impacts life in Cairo, Illinois."

I worked alongside Secretary Clinton's team to promote international tourism when I served on the President's Travel and Tourism Advisory Board. We implemented a variety of policies that helped increase the number of international tourists to the U.S. from 55 million in 2009 to 70 million in 2013 – which gave the American economy a boost when it needed it the most, while never compromising our national security.

Secretary Clinton's work on two important initiatives made a profound impact on Florida's economy by increasing the number of Brazilian visitors to the state. Florida is the top U.S. destination for Brazilian tourists, who spend more than $5,000 per visit, higher than the average overseas tourist and nearly twice as much as visitors from France and the UK.

First, she reduced inefficiencies and optimized the process for Brazilians to obtain U.S. visas, by creating new visa adjudicator positions and expanding processing facilities. This resulted in a 58% increase in visa processing capacity in just one year. According to Secretary Clinton, “in Sao Paulo in Brazil, it once took 140 days to get a visa, that time is now under 48 hours.”

Second, Clinton worked with the Brazilian government and American Airlines to increase the number of flights to the U.S., adding 10 additional flights a week between Miami and Brazil, including the first nonstop routes from Miami to Recife and Salvador.

Her work paid off. In 2012, it was reported that “more flights” and “easing of the visa logjam” are listed as two of the four reasons Florida has become “a magnet for Brazilians.” In fact, the number of visitors from Brazil to South Florida has reached record levels over the past few years, making Brazil Miami-Dade’s top international market. Secretary Clinton’s efforts on these two initiatives increased the number of visitors to Florida, fueled money into Florida’s economy, and created tens of thousands of jobs for Floridians in the middle of an economic downturn.

Earlier this year, Secretary of Commerce Penny Pritzker said, “travel and tourism to and within the United States has been a significant contributor to our economic recovery.” The increase in foreign travelers under Secretary Clinton’s watch spurred economic growth and created jobs at a time when America needed it most, particularly in Florida.

Media Matters for America: “MSNBC's Joan Walsh Corrects Mischaracterization Of Clinton's Court-Appointed Defense Work”

By Emily Arrowood

July 9, 2014, 3:48 p.m. EDT

MSNBC political analyst Joan Walsh corrected attempts to cast doubt on the fact that Hillary Clinton served as defense attorney on a decades-old criminal case at the direction of the court, pointing out that, in fact, the judge had compelled Clinton to take the case.

The July 8 edition of MSNBC's Hardball with Chris Matthews rehashed Hillary Clinton's work as a court-appointed defense attorney in the 1975 prosecution of an alleged rapist, a role that, while known publicly for years, is reemerging in wake of the conservative Washington Free Beacon's improper appropriation and publication of an interview Clinton gave in the mid-1980s discussing the case.

During the discussion, frequent MSNBC guest and president of the conservative Bernard Center for Women Michelle Bernard repeatedly suggested that Clinton had elected to represent the defendant of her own volition. Joan Walsh, Salon editor and MSNBC analyst, attempted to correct the record on Clinton's court appointment, pointing out that "she was court-appointed" and that the judge had forced her to take the case. Bernard, however, continued to imply Clinton may have voluntarily accepted the role after speaking with the prosecutor.

The fact that the court appointed Clinton to represent the defendant is not in doubt. The judge -- not the prosecutor -- directed Clinton to take on the case, as Glenn Thrush established in a 2008 Newsday report:

“On May 21, 1975, Tom Taylor rose in court to demand that Washington County Judge Maupin Cummings allow him to fire his male court-appointed lawyer in favor of a female attorney. Taylor, who earned a meager wage at a paper bag factory and lived with relatives, had already spent 10 days in the county jail and was grasping for a way to avoid a 30 years-to-life term in the state penitentiary for rape.

“Taylor, 41, figured a jury would be less hostile to a rape defendant represented by a woman, according to one of his friends. Cummings agreed to the request, scanned the list of available female attorneys (there were only a half dozen in the county at the time) and assigned Rodham, who had virtually no experience in criminal litigation.

"'Hillary told me she didn't want to take that case, she made that very clear,' recalls prosecutor Gibson, who phoned her with the judge's order.

"'I didn't feel comfortable taking on such a client, but Mahlon gently reminded me that I couldn't very well refuse the judge's request,' the eventual first lady writes in 'Living History.'"

Clinton had no choice but to accept the court's order, despite voicing reservations, a fact the case's prosecutor reiterated to CNN:

"Mahlon Gibson told CNN on Wednesday the then 27-year-old Hillary Rodham (now Clinton) was 'appointed' by the judge in the case, even though she voiced reservations.

"[...]

"Gibson said that it is 'ridiculous' for people to question how Clinton became Taylor's representation.

"'She got appointed to represent this guy,' he told CNN when asked about the controversy.

"According to Gibson, Maupin Cummings, the judge in the case, kept a list of attorneys who would represent poor clients. Clinton was on that list and helped run a legal aid clinic at the time.

"Taylor was assigned a public defender in the case but Gibson said he quickly 'started screaming for a woman attorney' to represent him.

"Gibson said Clinton called him shortly after the judge assigned her to the case and said, 'I don't want to represent this guy. I just can't stand this. I don't want to get involved. Can you get me off?'

"'I told her, 'Well contact the judge and see what he says about it,' but I also said don't jump on him and make him mad,' Gibson said. 'She contacted the judge and the judge didn't remove her and she stayed on the case.'"

The Daily Caller opinion: Lanny Davis: "Hillary Clinton's 'Hard Choices' Show Who She Really Is"

By Lanny Davis

July 9, 2014, 10:02 p.m. EDT

The reviews are in on Hard Choices, Hillary Clinton's history of her four-year tenure as U.S. secretary of State. They are almost all positive. Her book sales are strong — number one on The New York Times bestseller list for three weeks in a row.

What is missing from most of the reviews is what the book reveals about Clinton the person. I can speak to that, knowing her since I was a senior and she was a freshman at Yale Law School when we first met in the fall of 1969.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First, to state the most obvious: Hard Choices is about Hillary working hard.

We have all read the data of her travels and meetings as secretary of State: 401 days on the road, one million miles traveled, 112 countries visited. The book depicts the results of that hard work, her enduring achievements as secretary of State, including her indefatigable personal shuttle diplomacy between Israel and Egypt, which led to a cease-fire between Israel and the Hamas-led Palestinians in Gaza, saving countless lives; her determined negotiations with Russia, which led to a reduction in U.S.-Russian nuclear missiles with better verification; and her successful effort to obtain global cooperation imposing economic sanctions on Iran, widely credited with bringing Iran to the negotiating table regarding its nuclear weapons program.

Then there is Hillary the strong and decisive leader, who made difficult judgments based on the available facts, taking the risk that, with the wisdom of hindsight, she might turn out to be wrong. The most dramatic example, described in page-turning detail in her book, was her support of President Obama's courageous decision to send in the Navy SEALs to kill Osama bin Laden, a decision opposed by Vice President Biden.

Finally, the book conveys the positive global effects of her authenticity and likeability. In my view, one of Clinton's most enduring achievements as secretary of State — maybe the most important — was the dramatic increase in positive perceptions of American leadership around the world during her tenure. In the last two years of the Bush administration, according to Gallup World Poll data, America trailed Britain, France, Germany, Japan and China in approval of its leadership. That's right, behind even China. In 2011, after two years of Clinton as secretary of State, America was tied for first place with Germany.

Finally, several sentences in the last two chapters of her book convey core insights into the real Hillary Clinton that her long-time friends have understood over the years.

When Obama asked her to stay into the second term, she wrote that she "felt the tug of my 'service gene,' that voice telling me there is no higher calling or more noble purpose than serving your country." But then made she made the decision to return to private life — "spending more time with my family, reconnecting with friends, doing the everyday things I missed."

She also wrote poignantly about her thoughts at her mom's funeral: "I looked at Chelsea and thought about how proud Mom was of her. Mom measured her own life by how much she was able to help us and serve others. I knew if she was still with us, she would be urging us to do the same. Never rest on your laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place. That's our unfinished business."

The first time I met Hillary Rodham in September 1969, we were standing in line to register for classes at Yale Law School. I asked her if she needed any advice on how to study and brief cases in her first semester at a fairly challenging law school. She said, politely, "no thank you," and then asked: "Can you tell me where I can find the nearest legal services clinic?"

No, Hillary Clinton hasn't changed through all the years: the importance of family and friends, the "service gene" as active today as I witnessed some 45 years ago, motivating her to "never quit — never stop working to make the world a better place."

Time: "Here's What John Kerry Can Learn From Hillary About Israel's New Crisis"

By Michael Crowley

July 9, 2014

[Subtitle:] Clinton writes that Obama was "understandably wary" about intervening the last time violence flared

Secretary of State John Kerry spoke with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Wednesday, amid rising fears that the confrontation between Israel and Hamas could escalate to new levels of bloodshed. But Kerry might also want to talk to his Foggy Bottom predecessor about how the last round of violence in the intractable conflict was defused.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Israel and Hamas last fought in Gaza in November 2012, President Barack Obama dispatched then Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to broker a cease-fire. As Israel called up 75,000 reservists for a possible ground invasion, Obama was "understandably wary" of the U.S. taking a direct mediation role, Clinton writes in her new book, Hard Choices.

"If we tried to broker a cease-fire and failed, as seemed quite likely, it would sap America's prestige and credibility in the region," Clinton says. American involvement might also risk undercutting Israel, whose "right to defend itself" Clinton underscores. Obama officials also worried a U.S. role might "elevate" the conflict's profile, leading both sides to harden their negotiating positions.

Even so, Clinton and Obama concluded that it was "imperative to resolve the crisis before it became a ground war." Clinton knew that Netanyahu didn't want to invade Gaza — but that he faced domestic pressure to do so and had no clear "exit ramp" that would allow him to de-escalate without seeming to back down, Clinton writes.

Just over 18 months later, many of the same dynamics apply as Obama weighs whether Kerry can — or should — broker a deal like the one Clinton struck.

For now, Obama officials have two public messages. One is that Israel is entitled to hit back at Hamas when the hard-line Palestinian group launches rockets at its territory. "No country can accept rocket fire aimed at civilians, and we certainly support Israel's right to defend itself against these attacks," State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki saidTuesday. The other is that the two sides should rein in the violence — which now takes the form of Hamas rocket attacks and Israeli air strikes. "We're continuing to convey the need to de-escalate to both sides," Psaki said.

That may not happen on its own, warns Dennis Ross, a former Obama White House aide who has handled Middle East issues for multiple Presidents. "Even if neither side wants it to spin out of control, the potential for that is quite high," Ross says.

That's why Obama has to decide whether to step in, especially given growing signs of an Israeli ground invasion of Gaza. Israel's 2009 incursion into the Hamas-governed coastal territory left 1,400 dead, and badly damaged Israel's international image. A second invasion was averted in November 2012 only by the Clinton-brokered cease-fire, a deal struck just 48 hours before Israeli troops planned to swarm into Hamas' stronghold.

Just before Thanksgiving that year, Clinton flew to the region and met with Israeli and Palestinian leaders. She also saw Egypt's then President Mohamed Morsi, whose Muslim Brotherhood government was friendly with Hamas. The result was a mutual cease-fire, overseen by Egypt, with the promise of future negotiations about Hamas' rocket arsenal and Israel's Gaza blockade. Those talks never went far. But the cease-fire held. (Netanyahu won another concession, Clinton recalls: a phone call from Obama promising U.S. help against rocket smuggling into Gaza. "Did [Netanyahu] take some personal satisfaction from making the President jump through hoops?" Clinton wondered.)

Obama faces a different calculus today, including the recent collapse of Kerry's push for a Middle East peace deal, and a new Egyptian regime that is decidedly hostile to Hamas, making Cairo unlikely to mediate again.

But many of the core principles that Clinton says swayed Obama in 2012 likely still resonate at the White House: that peace in the Middle East is a key U.S. national-security priority, that a ground war in Gaza would be disastrous, and that there is "no substitute for American leadership." Indeed, Clinton writes that after the 2012 cease-fire deal, an Israeli official told her that "my diplomatic intervention was the only thing standing in the way of a much more explosive confrontation."

The burning question for Obama is whether the same holds true today.

Washington Post column: Harold Meyerson: "Hillary Clinton's identity crisis"

By Harold Meyerson

July 9, 2014, 8:39 p.m. EDT

Which Hillary Clinton would run for — and, more important, govern as — president? The onetime New York senator whom many Wall Street bankers supported and former secretary of state who gave speeches to Goldman Sachs and others for a reported $200,000 per? Or the leader of an increasingly progressive Democratic Party, who, in an interview with the German magazine Der Spiegel this week, affirmed the thesis of economist Thomas Piketty? “I think he makes a very strong case that we have unbalanced our economy too much towards favoring capital and away from labor,” she said.

Friend or foe of Wall Street? On the one hand, it was Clinton’s husband who entrusted the nation’s economic policymaking to former Goldman Sachs executive Robert Rubin, who, along with subsequent Treasury secretaries Lawrence Summers and Timothy Geithner, promoted an agenda of free trade, deregulation and privileging the interests of big banks over all others. On the other, as a senator, Clinton called for tougher regulations on derivatives and said that “Wall Street has played a significant role” in the subprime mortgage disaster — and she did so in 2007, one year before the great collapse.

What makes Clinton’s predicament particularly significant is that it’s not hers alone. For decades, the default position of generations of Democrats has been to back economic policies that helped ordinary Americans — higher minimum wages, the right to unionize, spending on infrastructure — without reining in banks, corporations and the wealthy beyond the basic constraints laid down by the New Deal. They could do this for one fundamental reason: Economic growth in the United States was largely equitable; prosperity was broadly shared.

When President John F. Kennedy famously declared that “a rising tide lifts all boats,” he was not merely describing how the economy worked in the pre-globalization and highly unionized United States of the post-World War II decades. He was also, however inadvertently, explaining how the relative absence of class conflict enabled Democrats to be both pro-union and a friend of financial elites, who were not yet accruing all the proceeds of growth for themselves.

But that was then.

Today, as Clinton told Der Spiegel, capital has eclipsed labor. Fully 95 percent of the nation’s income growth since the recovery began in 2009, University of California economist Emmanuel Saez has shown, has gone to the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans. The share of the country’s gross domestic product going to profits is at a record high; the share going to wages a record low.

Under these conditions, what’s a Democrat — what’s Hillary Clinton — to do? How does she propose to re-create a United States where the gains in productivity go not only to the largest shareholders but also to the workers who make those gains?

She could, for starters, propose cutting taxes on employers who raise wages in line with the nation’s annual productivity increase, and raising the levy on employers who don’t. She could propose hiking taxes on capital gains and dividends at least to the level of taxes on work-derived income. She could propose cutting taxes on corporations that divide their boards equally between representatives of shareholders and employees, as the Germans do, and raising the tax rates of corporations that don’t, that are run almost solely for the benefit of their large shareholders and their top executives — as most U.S. corporations are.

Immodest proposals, to be sure, but in an economy in which nearly all the income growth accrues to a sliver of investors, Democrats no longer have the luxury of indulging both that sliver and everybody else. As Clinton’s proto-candidacy continues to take shape, one modest way that she could begin to address the scourge of inequality would be to follow the example of Franklin Roosevelt.

In selecting his Treasury secretary, Roosevelt opted not to choose Sen. Carter Glass, in part because Glass wanted a J.P. Morgan executive as his deputy. As Adam Cohen documents in “Nothing to Fear,” his history of Roosevelt’s first 100 days as president, Roosevelt told his aide Raymond Moley, “We simply cannot go along with Twenty-Three.” (The Morgan bank was headquartered at 23 Wall St.)

Expanded from 23 to the rest of the street, that’s pretty good guidance for our next president, whomever it may be. Wall Street veterans aren’t likely to see Wall Street’s ascendancy over the rest of the economy as a problem. The cure for Clinton’s, and the Democrats’, identity crisis begins with a clear declaration that the nation’s economy will no longer be entrusted to the leaders of the very institutions that have brought it low.

Slate blog: Weigel: "How Hillary Clinton Went from Working Class Hero to Elite Loser, in Two Bill Kristol Columns"

By David Weigel

July 9, 2014, 2:07 p.m. EDT

One of the great joys of political reporting circa 2014 is how quickly you can crowd-source a question. After skimming a column about how Hillary Clinton's book tour might have happened too early (this, after how many months of coverage of when Clinton would climb back on the horse?), I flashed back to all the punditry from 2011 and 2012 about Clinton's political might. Hadn't pundits argued for Joe Biden to leave the ticket and the popular, adroit Hillary Clinton to replace him? Had any pundits argued both for a Hillary-veep switch and argued that Hillary 2016 was falling apart?

Within five minutes of my ask, Reuters reporter Gabriel Debenedetti produced two Bill Kristol columns that did exactly this. On May 28, 2012, Kristol trolled the Obama campaign by suggesting an obvious face-saving/election-winning switcheroo. Joe Biden had to go. (My emphasis.)

"Who should replace Biden? Everyone knows the answer. Hillary Clinton received nearly 18 million votes in the race for the 2008 Democratic nomination. Her rating in a Washington Post survey a couple of weeks ago was 65 percent favorable, 27 percent unfavorable. Biden hurts Obama. She would help him. What's more, she'd help with precisely the undecided voters Obama needs in November. Many of them are white, working- and middle-class Americans who supported her in the 2008 primaries. They overcame their disappointment at Clinton's defeat to vote for Obama that November. But many became disillusioned and voted Republican in 2010, producing that year's GOP landslide. Barack Obama needs to win back as many of them as possible in 2012. They voted for Hillary Clinton once. Surely they'd be more likely to return to Obama if given the opportunity to vote for her again as part of the ticket."

Just two years and one month later, Kristol reacted to Hillary Clinton's book tour -- specifically, her inartful answer to Diane Sawyer's question about how rich she'd become post-Foggy Bottom. In "Our Dead Broke Leaders," he suggested that the Republican party could easily out-campaign this royalist.

"Republicans, for a change, aren't saddled with the prospect of an out-of-touch insider as their presidential nominee. (Is it conceivable that no populist Democrat will see Hillary Clinton's glaring weaknesses and take her on?) The populist mantle, the reformist mantle, the Main Street and Middle America mantles, are there for the Republican taking."

To be fair, perhaps the white, working, and middle-class Americans who supported Hillary before do not technically live in middle America, or on Main Street. They might live on State Street, or Locust Street, or Electric Avenue. Thanks anyway to Debenedetti for coming up with the columns. It's nice when someone covers politics with consistency.

Associated Press: APNewsBreak: "Different Attackers In Benghazi?"

By Donna Cassata and Bradley Klapper

July 9, 2014, 7:53 p.m. EDT

Newly revealed testimony from top military commanders involved in the U.S. response to the Benghazi attacks suggests that the perpetrators of a second, dawn attack on a CIA complex probably were different from those who penetrated the U.S. diplomatic mission the evening before and set it ablaze, killing Ambassador Chris Stevens and another American.

The second attack, which killed two security contractors, showed clear military training, retired Gen. Carter Ham told Congress in closed-door testimony released late Wednesday. The assault probably was the work of a new team of militants, seizing on reports of violence at the diplomatic mission the night before and hitting the Americans while they were most vulnerable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The testimony, which The Associated Press was able to read ahead of its release, could clarify for the first time the events of Sept. 11, 2012, that have stirred bitter recriminations in the U.S., including Republican-led congressional investigations and campaign-season denunciations of the Obama administration, which made inaccurate statements about the Libyan attacks. The testimony underscores a key detail that sometimes has been lost in the debate: that the attacks were two distinct events over two days on two different buildings, perhaps by unrelated groups.

The U.S. government still has not fully characterized the first attack in which, according to Ham and eight other military officers, men who seemed familiar with the lightly protected diplomatic compound breached it and set it on fire, killing Stevens and communications specialist Sean Smith. A disorganized mob of looters then overran the facility.

In testimony to two House panels earlier this year, the officers said that commanders didn't have the information they needed to understand the nature of the attack, that they were unaware of the extent of the U.S. presence in Benghazi at the time and they were convinced erroneously for a time that they were facing a hostage crisis without the ability to move military assets into place that would be of any use.

The testimony reveals how little information the military had on which to base an urgent response.

Two House panels — Armed Services and Oversight and Government Reform — conducted interviews with the nine officers on separate days from January to April.

Four Americans died in Benghazi, including Stevens. To this day, despite the investigations, it's not clear if the violence resulted from a well-planned, multiphase military-type assault or from a loosely connected, escalating chain of events.

In their testimony, military officials expressed some uncertainty about the first attack, describing protests and looting in an assault that lasted about 45 minutes.

The military attache to the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli told Congress the first attack showed some advance planning. The Libyan police officer guarding the diplomatic compound fled as it began.

The defense attache, whose name wasn't released, suggested the attackers "had something on the shelf" — an outline of a plan based on previously obtained information about the compound and its security measures, so they were ready to strike when the opportunity arose.

"They came in, and they had a sense of purpose, and I think it sometimes gets confused because you had looters and everyone else coming in," he said. "It was less than kind of full, thought-out, methodical."

Ham testified that the second attack, which killed security officers Tyrone Woods and Glen Doherty at the annex a mile from the diplomatic compound where the assault began the night before, showed clear military training. It was probably the work of a new team of militants, taking advantage after reports of violence at the first site and American vulnerability.

"Given the precision of the attack, it was a well-trained mortar crew, and in my estimation they probably had a well-trained observer," said Ham, who headed the U.S. command in Africa. The second attack showed "a degree of sophistication and military training that is relatively unusual and certainly, I think, indicates that this was not a pickup team. This was not a couple of guys who just found a mortar someplace."

Ham said the nearly eight-hour time lapse between the two attacks also seemed significant. "If the team (that launched the second attack) was already there, then why didn't they shoot sooner?" he asked.

"I think it's reasonable that a team came from outside of Benghazi," he said of the second attack in testimony on April 9. Violent extremists saw an opportunity "and said, 'Let's get somebody there.'" He also acknowledged that the absence of American security personnel on the ground soon enough after the first attack "allowed sufficient time for the second attack to be organized and conducted," he said.

Stevens had gone to Benghazi from the embassy in Tripoli to open a cultural center, State Department officials said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The attacks came as President Barack Obama was in a close re-election battle, campaigning in part on the contention that al-Qaida no longer posed a significant threat to the United States and that, blending the economy and the fight against terrorism, General Motors was alive but "Osama bin Laden is dead." A terror attack on American assets could have damaged that argument.

Five days after the attack, after feverish email exchanges about her "talking points" among national security staff members and their spokesmen, U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice linked the Benghazi attacks to protests in Tunisia and Cairo over an anti-Islam video. Weeks later, U.S. officials retracted that account but never fully articulated a new one.

Republicans seized on the inaccuracies, contending that the Obama administration was covering up a terror attack for political gain.

Several congressional and independent investigations have faulted the State Department for inadequate security, but they have not provided a full reading of who was involved in the violence, what the motives were and how they could pull off such a seemingly complicated, multipronged assault.

People on both sides of the debate tend to link the two incidents as one attack.

The congressional testimony that distinguishes the attacks came from military officials in Tripoli or, like Ham, coordinating the response in Washington. Most have never given a public account. But they agreed that confusion reigned from the outset.

"We're under attack," was the first report the military received from Benghazi. That message came from Stevens' entourage to Tripoli in the late afternoon of Sept. 11. Word was relayed to the defense attache, who reported up the chain of command.

That report gave no indication about the size or intensity of the attack.

The defense attache testified that the assault on the diplomatic mission was followed by a mob that complicated and confused the situation.

He said of the original attackers, "I don't think they were on the objective, so to speak, longer than 45 minutes. They kind of got on, did their business, and left." For hours after that, he said, there were looters and "people throwing stuff and you see the graffiti and things like that."

Once the first attack ended around 10 p.m., the military moved to evacuate Americans from Benghazi, while preparing for what it erroneously believed might have been an emerging hostage situation involving Stevens.

In fact, Stevens died of smoke inhalation after the diplomatic post was set on fire in the first attack.

Seven-and-a-half hours later, at dawn, mortars crashed on a CIA compound that had been unknown to top military commanders.

The military worked up a response on numerous fronts.

At one point, fewer than 10 U.S. military personnel in Libya were grappling with the mortar and rocket-propelled grenade attack on Americans who had taken cover at the CIA facility and, some 600 miles away, the evacuation of about three dozen people from the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli by a convoy of armored vehicles.

An unarmed Predator drone conducting an operation nearby in eastern Libya had been repositioned over Benghazi, yet offered limited assistance during the nighttime and with no intelligence to guide it. A standby force training in Croatia was ordered to Sicily, while another farther afield was mobilized. Neither was nearly ready in time to intervene during the first 45-minute attack and couldn't predict the quick mortar attack the next morning. An anti-terrorism support team in Spain was deployed, though it, too, was hours away.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American reinforcements of a six-man security team, including two military personnel, were held up at the Benghazi airport for hours by Libyan authorities. Drone images and intelligence hadn't provided indications of a new attack, but word eventually came from two special forces troops who had made it to the annex and reported casualties from the dawn attack up the chain of command.

In Tripoli, military and embassy officials were evacuating the embassy there and destroying computer hardware and sensitive information.

The administration last month apprehended its first suspect, Ahmed Abu Khattala, and brought him to the United States to stand trial on terrorism charges.

The Justice Department maintains in court documents that Abu Khattala was involved in both attacks, and it describes the first breach on the diplomatic post as equally sophisticated. The government said a group of about 20 men, armed with AK-47- rifles, handguns and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, stormed the diplomatic facility in the first attack.

Abu Khattala supervised the looting after Americans fled, the government says, and then returned to the camp of the Islamist militant group Ansar al-Sharia, where the Justice Department says a large force began assembling for the second attack.

The Justice Department provided no supporting documentation for those conclusions. They also reflect the divisions among current and former government officials about the two attacks.

In her book "Hard Choices," former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton wrote that there were scores of attackers with different motives. "It is inaccurate to state that every single one of them was influenced by this hateful video. It is equally inaccurate to state that none of them were. Both assertions defy not only the evidence but logic as well."

Abu Khattala's lawyer says the government has failed to show that he was connected to either attack.

Ham, who happened to be in Washington that week, briefed Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Martin Dempsey. They informed the president.

Many of the military officials said they didn't even know about the diplomatic mission in Benghazi, let alone the CIA's clandestine installation nearby. Few knew of Stevens visiting the city that day. Given all of the confusion, Ham said there was one thing he clearly would have done differently: "Advise the ambassador to not go to Benghazi."

New York Post: Page Six: "Sales figures for Hillary's book continue to plunge"

By Ian Mohr

July 9, 2014, 10:36 p.m. EDT

Sales of Hillary Clinton's "Hard Choices" continued to plunge as new figures were released Wednesday.

According to Nielsen BookScan, Clinton's book sold just 16,000 copies in its most recent week, down from 28,000 a week prior. The title has sold 177,000 in its first month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Simon & Schuster reportedly gave Clinton a $14 million advance after her last book for the publisher sold 438,000 in its first week.

Clinton's tome was toppled from the No. 1 spot on the New York Times best-seller list by Edward Klein's Clinton "exposé," "Blood Feud," which sold 20,000 copies in the last week. However, BookScan measures only 85 percent of the market and not e-books.

U.S. News & World Report blog: The Run 2016: "Joe Biden Heading to Netroots Nation"

By David Catanese

July 9, 2014, 5:50 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] 2 of the 3 biggest stars in the Democratic Party are heading to the liberal gala.

The announcement Wednesday that Vice President Joe Biden is heading to Netroots Nation means that two of the three biggest stars in the Democratic Party will attend the largest gala of progressives in the nation this year.

Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, will have a bus visiting in her absence.

Biden will join Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., during the three-day conference in Detroit, Michigan. He's scheduled to speak a week from Thursday; Warren is slated for a morning address the day after. That same weekend Clinton will be doing a book signing in St. Paul, Minnesota, about a 90-minute flight from Detroit.

It will mark the first time Biden's talking at the conference and will come at point when the Democratic Party is wrestling with how best to approach the issue of income inequality.

"From his longtime support of labor unions to speaking out on important issues like LGBT equality, Vice President Biden has in many ways given heart and soul to this administration," said Raven Brooks, executive director of Netroots Nation, in a statement.

Clinton, in the midst of a monthlong promotional tour of her book, declined an invite. In one sense, it makes sense for her to avoid the risk of a cool welcome by some of the nation's most hardened liberals. But if The New Republic's Noam Scheiber is right, she's already made great inroads with the group who torpedoed her nomination six years ago.

Now that two of the Democrat's top three potential 2016 presidential candidates will be present, Clinton's absence will only be amplified.

But she'll have a surrogate of sorts on her behalf. Ready For Hillary, a pro-Clinton group unaffiliated with the former Secretary of State, is sending its bus to the conference.

Whether attendees are ready to hop on will be a fair measure of how far Clinton has come with the left.

Wall Street Journal: "Cuomo Weighs Making Trip to Israel"

By Erica Orden

July 10, 2014, 12:01 a.m. EDT

In his nearly four years in office, Gov. Andrew Cuomo has ventured beyond the borders of New York state only a handful of times.

In coming months, that may change.

According to people familiar with the plans, Mr. Cuomo's administration is weighing a travel schedule that would send the governor to locations including Israel and Puerto Rico, an itinerary that would mark the first time he has left the country since he took office in 2011.

"There are always discussions about trade and economic-development missions," said Matt Wing, a spokesman for Mr. Cuomo. "Nothing is planned."

The governor's international travel, the people familiar with the matter said, would be conducted for the ostensible purpose of attracting business to an economic-development program, Global NY. Mr. Cuomo launched that initiative earlier this year to encourage export deals in foreign markets for startup companies in the state's new tax-free zones. It also opens the tax-free zones to foreign companies interested in establishing a branch of their business in New York.

To that end, administration officials planning the trips in recent weeks include Special Counsel Linda Lacewell, Cuomo liaison for Jewish affairs David Lobl and officials from Empire State Development Corp., the state agency that runs the Global NY program.

For Mr. Cuomo, who is said to have national political aspirations, such trips could boost his standing among other Democrats jockeying for the 2016 presidential nomination. While Mr. Cuomo is likely to sit the race out if former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton runs, he would be considered a top contender if she decides against running.

Current events could complicate or derail any potential ventures. In Israel, tensions have flared in the wake of the kidnapping and killing last month of three Israeli teenagers in the West Bank, and the subsequent killing of a Palestinian teenager.

In the weeks since, Israeli security forces have mounted a crackdown on Hamas members, and Palestinian militants have stepped up rocket attacks against Israel.

Thus far, Mr. Cuomo has made a point of sticking close to his home state. Since his gubernatorial inauguration, he has traveled once to Puerto Rico, for a political conference; twice to Washington, D.C.; twice to Los Angeles for fundraisers; and once to Charlotte, N.C., for the 2012 Democratic National Convention.

Mr. Cuomo has toyed with international trips in prior years, according to people familiar with the matter. In late 2011, the administration considered sending the governor to destinations including China and Israel, and a similar plan resurfaced roughly two years ago.

It isn't clear why those trips never materialized, but Mr. Cuomo has touted his infrequent travel outside the state as a measure of his commitment to the cause of New York.

International travel is common for ambitious governors, particularly to Israel.

In the spring of 2012, Republican New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie embarked on a "Jersey to Jerusalem Trade Mission," where he visited the Western Wall and met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Republican Texas Gov. Rick Perry has visited the country several times, most recently in the fall of 2013. In 1998, George W. Bush, then the governor of Texas, visited Israel with a group of other governors, two years before he ran for president.

Mr. Cuomo, however, hasn't visited Israel since 2002, when he made two trips there during his bid for the Democratic nomination for governor of New York.

In an interview with the Jewish Week newspaper in September 2002, Mr. Cuomo spoke about his connection to the country.

"I have a long relationship with Israel. I am a born-and-bred New Yorker. I was raised in a community in Queens with Jewish people," he said in the interview, which was published in 2010.

"So I feel a connection, I feel a bond. It is something I would like to do personally," he said of traveling to Israel, "and something I feel professionally the governor could do and should do."

Washington Free Beacon: "What They're Saying About the Hillary Tapes"

By David Rutz

July 9, 2014, 3:05 p.m. EDT

Mainstream media members have listened to the tapes uncovered by the Washington Free Beacon of Hillary Clinton laughingly discussing a child rapist she defended in the 1970s, and they've come away rather troubled about how they bode for her 2016 presidential prospects.

Both Morning Joe's Joe Scarborough and Huffington Post reporter Sam Stein called her comments "disturbing," with Scarborough's liberal co-host Mika Brzezinski adding there was a "bigger problem" there for Clinton.

The Washington Post's Karen Tumulty questioned the "swagger" and "dismissiveness" of Clinton regarding the emotionally sensitive issue on Andrea Mitchell Reports. On Hardball Tuesday, host Chris Matthews opened the segment about the case coming back to "haunt" Clinton and wondered why she would be laughing about it. Left-wing Salon's Joan Walsh even said she couldn't "sugarcoat" the tape that she admitted was not "fun" to listen to, and fellow MSNBC guest Michelle Bernard said they could be "very problematic" for Clinton.

CNN's Brianna Keilar also stated Clinton's attitude was "bad politics" and could serve to alienate young voters.

Others have seized on her recent remarks on the case to Mumsnet, where she claimed to have been appointed by a local judge to the case and requested to be taken off it. However, in the Roy Reed interview uncovered by reporter Alana Goodman, Clinton said, "The prosecutor called me a few years ago, he said he had a guy who had been accused of rape, and the guy wanted a woman lawyer. Would I do it as a favor for him?"'

The Washington Free Beacon's Andrew Stiles noted the "entire American media establishment" could not be bothered with asking Clinton about the tapes for more than three weeks after they were first published, leaving it to Mumsnet, a British parenting website.

"What she said last week does not appear to be truthful, does it?" Scarborough asked on Morning Joe Tuesday.

"It doesn't serve her well," reporter Mark Halperin replied.

MSNBC's PoliticsNation host Al Sharpton said the tapes would put a dent into Clinton's image as an advocate for women.

"It clearly is not the kind of situation that she wants to have to defend, when you hear in your own voice taking lightly something that speaks to one of your core issues, and that is the value of women," he said.

Hillary Clinton Pushes to Expand Access to Pre-Kindergarten // NYT // Amy Chozick & Jess Bidgood – June 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday pushed to broaden President Obama's efforts to expand access to pre-kindergarten, proposing more federal money for states to provide preschool to children from moderate and low-income families.

The proposal is the first policy proposal Mrs. Clinton has put forth since she officially kicked off her campaign with a speech on Saturday that was heavy on talk of lifting the middle class but light on specifics.

That changed on Monday when she said she would "invest in our most important assets, our children" and laid out a plan that would give incentives to states to provide public preschool to children whose family incomes are below 200 percent of the federal poverty line. The plan would be directed at the half of the country's 8.1 million 3- and 4-year-olds who are not currently enrolled in pre-kindergarten, her campaign said.

Mrs. Clinton also proposed doubling funding for the early Head Start program, as well as a middle-class tax cut that could "go towards helping parents pay for quality child care."

Speaking on the day that Jeb Bush officially entered the race for the Republican nomination, Mrs. Clinton sought to distinguish her position on early childhood education with that of her potential Republican rivals.

"Republicans aren't just missing the boat on early childhood education — they're trying to sink it," Mrs. Clinton said at a Y.M.C.A. in Rochester, N.H., where she read "The Very Hungry Caterpillar" to a room of young children.

Of all the issues Mrs. Clinton could have delved into, early childhood education is perhaps the most obvious and among the safest. Liberal Democrats have criticized Mrs. Clinton for not addressing Wall Street regulation, financial reform and trade in her Saturday address, the most wide-ranging of her campaign so far.

Policies affecting children fit comfortably into Mrs. Clinton's broader biographical message. As a candidate this time around, she has emphasized her background advocating for children, including at the Children's Defense Fund in the 1970s, and as first lady and a senator. At the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation, Mrs. Clinton started "Too Small to Fail," an initiative aimed at educating young children.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Clinton continued Monday to avoid taking a firm position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal currently being debated in Washington.

"I will judge what's in the final agreement, but I hope it can be made better," Mrs. Clinton said as she answered questions from reporters in a packed barn on an apple orchard in Concord, N.H., during her second campaign stop of the day.

One Democratic rival, Martin O'Malley, was quick to criticize Mrs. Clinton for calling the "fast track" portion of Mr. Obama's trade deal a "process issue" in her New Hampshire remarks. Giving the president such "fast trade" powers would allow him to strike a deal with limited congressional oversight.

“For thousands of American workers whose jobs are on the line with T.P.P., fast track is not a ‘process issue,’” said Lis Smith, O’Malley’s deputy campaign manager. “It’s a straightforward vote on their future and their livelihood.”

Clinton says she has connected with voters in early stages of campaign // WMUR – June 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said Monday that she has used her first few months on the campaign trail to connect with voters.

Clinton gave her first one-on-one television interview since announcing her candidacy when she spoke with News 9's Josh McElveen. She has taken some heat from the media during the first months of her campaign for keeping the press at arm's length and holding closed events, but she said there was a reason for that.

"I hadn't been in politics since I became secretary of state," Clinton said. "I had certainly followed closely what was happening in our country because of the Great Recession, but I wanted that touch and that feel that you can only get by sitting and talking and looking at somebody."

Clinton didn't apologize for the initial soft launch of her campaign and said she is now happy to take on any question she gets, be it her plan for the economy or questions surrounding foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation while she was secretary of state.

"I don't know if we have enough time in this interview to debunk all of the allegations that were made by people who were wielding the partisan ax," Clinton said.

Clinton said she should be evaluated on her record and her plans for the future.

"I say judge me on my whole record, and in fact what people in New Hampshire talk to me about is the cost of child care, about their student loans, about how they can start and grow a new business," she said.

Clinton also said she isn't sold on the Trans Pacific Partnership deal President Barack Obama wants but failed to get through Congress last week.

"I'm still going to judge the deal at the end of the day with whether I think it's good for America," Clinton said, saying she thinks it needs work. "I think the questions that were raised are ones that have to be answered."

Clinton said she will continue to answer questions that have been raised over the past couple months, and she said voters in New Hampshire will see plenty of her moving forward.

Clinton also held several packed-house events in New Hampshire on Monday. She began with a roundtable discussion on early childhood education in Rochester.

Later, Clinton gave a speech before a large gathering at a midday “Launch Party” at the Carter Hill Orchard in Concord.

Click to watch raw video of Clinton's speech at the party.

At 6:30 p.m., Clinton is scheduled to be the keynote speaker at the Manchester City Democratic Committee’s Flag Day Dinner at the Puritan Backroom Conference Center.

Challenging Clinton on the Democratic side are U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee.

Hillary Clinton on the issues: Six questions on the campaign trail // The Concord Monitor // Casey McDermott – June 15, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton returned to New Hampshire this week, several days after what her campaign is dubbing its official “launch.” During a stop at Carter Hill Orchard in Concord, where she spoke about her goals as president and rallied several hundred supporters, Clinton sat down for interview with the Monitor — one of the first she’s done during this campaign. A recap of that conversation, which lasted just under 10 minutes, appears below.

How do you plan, if elected, to bridge the gap with Republican politicians — or even with Republican voters who might like the ideas of the other party?

Well the first thing I would do is what I did as Senator and Secretary of State, where I worked across the aisle all the time... I will do whatever it takes to reach out to anybody, anytime, anywhere in pursuit of common ground on issues that I think are important for the country — but I will also stand my ground. So I think the first thing is, I know how important it is to build relationships and be constantly working on congressional outreach and informational meetings and all that goes into having a receptive audience when you say 'We're going to have to do some hard work here, I need you on my side.'

Secondly, I'm going to try to be producing an agenda that I hope can draw Republican voters and Republican members of congress. I'm well aware that the party on the other side has gone very far toward the Tea Party side, but I think there are still a lot of Republicans that understand that we've got to do things for our country — we have to make progress, and we've got to get results. So I will be presenting an agenda. A lot of which, unless they are going to say 'no' just because of extreme partisanship, should be attractive to them on behalf of our country. I will in my campaign try to elect more Democrats. More Democrats in the Senate, more Democrats in the House so that we get back to a better balance.

Can you identify any Republican politicians who you think you would work well with or have worked well with?

I have worked well. Now, we'll go through the political season, and they'll be cringing when I say I worked well with them. But my co-sponsor on health care for the national guard and reserves was Lindsey Graham. And he may not want to be reminded of it, but we worked really hard to get that done. I have worked until the political winds changed with John McCain on climate change. And I think that maybe we can get back to trying to find common ground there. So those are just two examples.

You have been making an effort to learn more about the substance abuse epidemic in New Hampshire. Do you have any specific ideas about how to combat that issue, here or elsewhere?

I will be rolling it out, but I have to say that it is such an issue here in New Hampshire, I can't escape it. This morning, at our early childhood event, a grandmother stood up and was saying how she is taking care of her grandchildren because her daughter has an addiction problem. And when I talked about it, heads were nodding and people were looking at each other. So I've had an ongoing process to reach out and my policy team has been talking to experts here in New Hampshire because I want to gather the best advice. What may work in one community might not work in another community. We do under the Affordable Care Act, as you know, include mental health coverage but we don't have enough personnel, resources, programs so that it really means what it should — both in substance abuse and in mental health. So I'm going to be rolling out policies in the campaign to talk about what more I need to be doing.

But three really quick things: You can't cut health care for vulnerable people like extended Medicaid and deal with these problems, you can't cut community resources that are public-private partnerships and deal with this problem, you can't close the remaining few facilities that will take care of low-income vulnerable people and deal with this problem. So some states are doing better on certain categories than others, but we've got to have some national attention paid to this, try to remove the stigma, pull it into the spotlight so that families are not suffering alone and we do have more opportunities.

You've talked a lot about the fights you're aiming to wage on behalf of "everyday Americans." Some voters, even within the Democratic party, seem to think you embody the establishment more than the everyday citizen. How do you plan to overcome that?

I've been fighting for progressive causes my entire adult life, and I've outlined some of the work I've done in the past along those lines in my speech on Saturday. But I think if you look at my record in the Senate, and you look at what I fought for, what I supported, I think it's fair to say that I was the leader in going after the home foreclosure problem, that I called for regulating derivatives, that I called for ending the carried interest income loophole for hedge fund managers and others. I have a long record. Now, I was Secretary of State for four years and I was out of the political arena, so I haven't been talking about everything I've done and everything that I'm building on to do in the future. But I think that by the time this campaign is really in full swing people will know that I have a tried and true record. I'm not a person who's come lately to these issues, and I also care very much about getting things done. So I want to come up with solutions that I, number one, think will work — but also that, number two, politically we can keep driving until we actually implement them.

Do you have any thoughts on how the federal government could be more transparent or any steps you would take to make it more open or more accessible to the public?

That's a good question because in my four fights, the fourth one is reforming government and the campaign finance system since Citizens United blew it up. And I think part of the challenge is to get the United States government into the 21st century using technology so that it can be more open and transparent. It is still very heavily dependent upon paper, it is woefully behind in frankly computerization of records, and it's hard to — it's such a big organization, it's hard to move it. But I think it's important because when I was Secretary of State, I said I want to put all of the dollars we spend in foreign aid on the web so everybody can see them. And you know it took a couple of years because you have to gather them all up and you have to put them in the right format and you have to design the site — but we got it done. So I will go into the White House with the same commitment: More openness, more transparency, aided and abetted by better technology.

You talk a lot about how much New Hampshire means to you. Is there a particular memory from your time here that has informed your approach as a candidate?

Well, there's so many. But my first trip to New Hampshire in 1991 occurred around my birthday. So when I landed in Keene, New Hampshire, I started celebrating my birthday across New Hampshire. I mean, people were doing cakes and cupcakes — and I just felt immediately at home. And it's been that way ever since. And I've made such good, close friends here. Of course, when I came here after the caucus in Iowa and was basically counted out and the people of New Hampshire opened their hearts and their homes to me, and voted for me, it was such an incredibly moving, heartwarming experience. I just like coming here, I like the feel for New Hampshire and I have gotten to know a lot of the people here.

Hillary Clinton's Vows to 'Fight' Evoke a Populist Appeal and a Contrast With Obama // NYT // Amy Chozick & Patrick Healy – June 15, 2015

In a roughly 45-minute speech on Saturday, Hillary Rodham Clinton made 14 references to herself as a fighter.

She said she would "fight" back against Republicans, "fight" climate change, "fight" to "strengthen America's families" and "fight" to "harness all of America's power." She used the verb in many of the same ways at her first major rally in Des Moines on Sunday, adding that she would "fight" for Midwestern values.

The presidential campaign's effort to define Mrs. Clinton as a fighter is, on the surface, a way to persuade middle-class voters that she is on their side. But it is also helping to convey a more subtle message: When it comes to political combat and perseverance, Mrs. Clinton is not President Obama.

The theme is emerging just as Mr. Obama has suffered a major setback on trade, one that many in Congress say reflects his weaknesses, namely his standoffishness and his inability to forge coalitions to push through an agenda.

During her campaign swing in Iowa on Sunday, Mrs. Clinton said no one would be a "tougher negotiator" on trade than she would. She offered her most explicit remarks yet on the president's handling of the issue, challenging him to work with Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader, and other congressional Democrats to improve the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal.

"My view is the White House should call Nancy and a few other of the Democrats to say, 'What would it take to get an agreement that would be better and not worse for American workers?'" Mrs. Clinton said.

She added: "What I want to see is a concerted effort to see how far we can push the agreement."

In the early months of her campaign, Mrs. Clinton has worked to highlight her connection to, and respect for, the president she served for four years as secretary of state. She has appealed to Mr. Obama's coalition of young and African-American voters with sweeping speeches on voting rights and civil rights. And even as liberal Democrats urged her to speak out against Mr. Obama's troubled trade deal, Mrs. Clinton had for the most part remained mum.

But now that Democrats in Congress have rebuffed Mr. Obama in a public and embarrassing way, Mrs. Clinton faces heightened pressure to present to voters how she would be a different kind of leader, in style if not in substance.

At the same time, Clinton aides believe that if they can make the "tenacious fighter" image stick with voters, "ultimately she will win this election," the campaign manager, Robby Mook, said Friday at a question-and-answer session hosted by Politico.

A new biographical video released by the campaign, titled "Fighter," opens with a silhouette of Mrs. Clinton as a voice says: "What is a fighter? To me, a fighter is someone who won't give up."

Persistence is another emphasis. In the video and on the stump, Mrs. Clinton talks about her unsuccessful attempt to overhaul the health care system as first lady and how she continued to work and eventually got the Children's Health Insurance Program passed.

The inevitable contrast with Mr. Obama's leadership style that such language draws is not lost on Democrats in early nominating states.

"Her years in Arkansas, as first lady, as a losing candidate in 2008 and as secretary of state — all of that taught her to be tough and to keep on going," said Marti Anderson, an Iowa state representative who has a 2008 Obama campaign sticker on the front door of her Des Moines home.

"Obama's quiet, a studious person, a wonk, a constitutional lawyer. Hillary is more of an activist," Mrs. Anderson said. "And you need an activist when you have, for instance, a Congress that puts obstacles in your way. An activist doesn't stop trying."

Mrs. Clinton's efforts to draw a contrast must be subtle, lest she alienate the Democratic base of voters who supported Mr. Obama. When asked whether the positioning of Mrs. Clinton is a strategy to distance her from Mr. Obama, a campaign spokesman reiterated that she is a "tenacious, dogged fighter" and that the description would be "front and center" in the campaign.

It helps that she has also earned an image in the public eye of not giving up, said Kiki McLean, a former aide to Mrs. Clinton.

"It's her Methodist Midwestern stick-to-itiveness," Ms. McLean said. "I don't think it's a strategic adoption" to contrast her with Mr. Obama, she added, "but they are definitely different personalities."

At her speech in New York on Saturday, the biggest rally of her presidential campaign, Mrs. Clinton said she was devoting her candidacy to "everyone who's ever been knocked down but refused to be knocked out." Kelly Clarkson's "Stronger (What Doesn't Kill You)" blared from the outdoor speakers.

After the speech, supporters seemed satisfied to have seen Mrs. Clinton showcase her own temperament and style. They could not help but compare them with those of the sitting president.

"What you can see today and what you can see all the time is that Hillary loves people," Lynn Forester de Rothschild, a prominent backer of Democrats and Mrs. Clinton, said after the speech. "And even people who really like Barack Obama have said to me that is not the case with him."

Those differences were apparent to some of the Iowans who helped catapult Mr. Obama to victory in the 2008 caucuses.

On Saturday night, the Clinton campaign organized a house party at Mrs. Anderson's home in the Beaverdale neighborhood, which some Democrats nicknamed "Obamadale" during the 2008 caucuses because of the strong support there for Mr. Obama. Several attendees said they were attracted to Mrs. Clinton's doggedness after having been disappointed by Mr. Obama's occasional lack of gumption.

"I think Hillary knows how to fight, and she certainly saw how to deal with Republicans when Bill Clinton was in the White House," said Jay Peterson, a librarian for the State of Iowa who backed Mr. Obama in the 2008 caucuses.

A spokesman for the White House declined to comment, though Mr. Obama's supporters point out that he has been criticized for being too combative, especially on issues like immigration and health care.

The Clinton campaign decided early on not to distance itself from the Obama administration; instead, Mrs. Clinton often praises the economic progress Mr. Obama has made. On Saturday, she said Mr. Obama had brought the country "back from the brink of depression," but"we face new challenges in our economy and our democracy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same time, polls show a growing frustration not just with Mr. Obama but also with Congress and Washington generally, indicating that Mrs. Clinton must convince voters she can bring something fresh to the White House.

Just 32 percent of Americans said they would prefer a presidential candidate whose political experience was mostly in the government in Washington, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll released May 5.

"The issue isn't that Washington isn't fighting. The issue is that people feel like there's no one in Washington fighting for them," said Guy Cecil, a co-chairman of Priorities USA Action, the pro-Clinton "super PAC."

Mrs. Clinton's message adds to the heat felt by Mr. Obama at a time when he is struggling to save his trade bill and avoid being incapacitated by his lame-duck status.

Bob Meddaugh, an activist who supported Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. in the 2008 caucuses and then embraced Mr. Obama, is hopeful that Mrs. Clinton can be more successful in building coalitions.

"I think she may be a little more direct and confrontational with individual people, compared to the way the president has been more standoffish with Republicans and even some Democrats," he said.

Sidney Blumenthal, Hillary Clinton's Confidant, Turns Over Memos on Libya // NYT // Michael Schmidt – June 15, 2015

A close confidant of Hillary Rodham Clinton's, Sidney Blumenthal, has provided the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, with dozens of pages of emails between him and Mrs. Clinton about Libya that were not included in the trove of emails that the State Department gave to the panel, according to people briefed on the matter.

The emails are similar to others that were provided to the committee by the State Department in February, the people said. Those emails included information about Libya that Mr. Blumenthal was passing along. Mrs. Clinton often forwarded the memos to her deputies to seek their feedback.

The committee had issued a subpoena to Mr. Blumenthal for any emails he had exchanged with Mrs. Clinton.

It is not clear whether Mr. Blumenthal's emails were among the 30,000 pages of emails from Mrs. Clinton's personal account that she provided to the State Department last year. Senior State Department officials have repeatedly said that they had fully complied with the committee's requests for the emails, while the committee's chairman, Representative Trey Gowdy, Republican of South Carolina, had harshly criticized the department for not providing documents to the panel.

Alec Gerlach, a spokesman for the State Department, said, "We provided the committee with a subset of documents that matched its request and will continue to work with them going forward." Secretary of State John Kerry "has been clear that the State Department will be both transparent and thorough in its obligations to the public on this matter," he added.

An official for the committee declined to comment.

Mrs. Clinton said that after she provided the 30,000 emails to the State Department, she deleted roughly the same number of emails from the account, which, she said, were personal and not related to her work as secretary of state.

Mr. Blumenthal is scheduled to appear Tuesday before the committee for a deposition. Mr. Gowdy wants to question Mr. Blumenthal about where he was receiving his information about Libya and who was paying him to produce the memos.

At the time that Mr. Blumenthal was sending the memos to Mrs. Clinton, he was being paid by the Clinton Foundation. Among Mr. Blumenthal's responsibilities was to help with research, "message guidance" and the planning of commemorative events, according to foundation officials.

At the same time, Mr. Blumenthal, a former aide to President Bill Clinton, was a paid consultant to Media Matters for America and American Bridge, organizations that conduct research and answer attacks against Mrs. Clinton.

Why It Matters That Hillary Clinton Wore Ralph Lauren // NYT // Vanessa Friedman – June 15, 2015

At her campaign opening rally on Roosevelt Island on Saturday (to be distinguished from her campaign announcement, in April), Hillary Rodham Clinton donned her now-signature look: a bright blue pantsuit with a matching bright blue shirt underneath. She stuck out a mile, matched her H campaign logo — which was also the design of her stage — and looked appropriately patriotic, especially when standing next to Bill Clinton in his red polo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, so expected, especially given her debut Instagram post: a series of red, white or blue pantsuits hanging in a row with the caption "Hard choices."

Mrs. Clinton has been extremely clever at co-opting the whole fashion-in-politics thing, defanging it and using it to demonstrate her quite developed sense of humor. It's a tool for her these days, and not just when it comes to image.

Vanessa Friedman writes about news happening in the fashion industry, from business decisions to designer moves.

Which is why it is worth thinking about. She is clearly considering it, as are her advisers, and using it to manipulate perception. As are all her competitors. Clothes are a political tool like any other. And that is why it was interesting to learn that the pantsuit she wore at her Roosevelt Island rally had been made by Ralph Lauren.

On the one hand, this is a clever choice: Mrs. Clinton's de facto dresser for the last few years had been Oscar de la Renta, and his death in October left her without a go-to label. She has known Mr. Lauren for a while: She presented him with the James Smithson Bicentennial Medal last June for his $13 million donation to help restore the Betsy Ross flag, and wore another blue Ralph Lauren pantsuit to do so.

And his personal narrative — Bronx boy made good — pretty much embodies the American dream. The clothes he sells are, in part, based on the aesthetics of that dream: the West, and the Gatsby version of Long Island. He understands sartorial stagecraft as well as any designer on the New York Fashion Week calendar, if not better.

Yet there's a possible weak spot in the relationship. Because for a candidate who has been pushing her connection to, and understanding of, the middle class — and whose speech while wearing the pantsuit was largely about closing the income gap — Ralph Lauren is a relatively inaccessible brand. It is also one often worn by and beloved of that sector of the population, the chief executives and financial wizards, she somewhat disavowed.

An average Ralph Lauren Women's Collection pantsuit, which this was — not, in other words, a style from the more accessible line, Lauren Ralph Lauren — is a few thousand dollars (a pinstriped wool jacket alone, for example, is $2,450 at the online store). That is out of reach for most voters.

It might not matter, given that voters also want their candidates to look presidential, which generally means good. Except that one of the story lines surrounding Mrs. Clinton has been how she is out-of-touch with those she claims to represent. It seems to me that working with a famous and high-end designer could provide ammunition for the opposition. And why even take that chance?

But maybe the fashion issue, with its potential sexism charges, is just too touchy for anyone, except fashion people like me, to go there.

Personally, if I were working out sartorial strategy on her team, I might suggest the issue be avoided entirely by opting for a contemporary label like Theory, which is known for its pantsuits, professional dressing — and anonymity. Its chief executive, Andrew Rosen, is a fashion mogul who has made something of a personal mission out of saving the New York garment district.

But that's me. And to be honest, I would not be surprised if, in the end, Ralph Lauren does become a Clinton wardrobe mainstay. If the campaign can avoid elitism charges, the brand will make her look confident, and absolutely convincing on the global stage.

According to a spokesman, the designer already works with the candidate "regularly."

Hillary signals aggressive attack on Republicans over Obamacare lawsuit // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton gave the "official" kick-off speech of her presidential candidacy on Saturday. Jeb Bush will give the "official" kick-off speech of his presidential candidacy today. The presidential race is underway in earnest. And we may have our first major policy battle of the 2016 race within weeks, or even days — one all about Obamacare.

In an interview with the Des Moines Register, Clinton signaled that if the Supreme Court guts subsidies for millions in three dozen states, she will respond with a plan to avert all the chaos that would result. And she sharply dismissed the legal arguments being made by the challengers:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about the Affordable Care Act, often called Obamacare, Clinton said that no matter which way the U.S. Supreme Court rules on federal subsidies, “I will be prepared to set forth what I would do.”

Clinton said that if the court does what she thinks it should do based on the law and the facts, “that would mean it would not rule in favor of the very contorted argument that is being made by the opponents to blow up the Affordable Care Act’s guarantee of coverage.”

That suggests Clinton may be preparing to go on offense against Republicans if the Court rules for the challengers. She is dismissing the lawsuit as a cynical effort to undermine the ACA’s basic coverage guarantee — telegraphing a very critical response to such a ruling — and signaling aggressive engagement if and when the debate turns to what should happen next.

Republicans appear divided over how to respond if the Court guts subsidies. Some Congressional Republicans are floating plans that would temporarily extend subsidies. But they are now saying they won’t produce any consensus plan until after the Court rules. Meanwhile, it’s not clear that Republicans can pass any such consensus plan, because conservatives may revolt at doing anything to keep Obamacare going. It’s also unclear whether GOP leaders would want to buck conservatives and pass a temporary fix with the help of a lot of Democrats. Beyond all this, the GOP fix plans appear likely to do more harm to Obamacare than good.

Clinton says she will offer a fix of her own — probably some kind of simple rewrite of the disputed legislative language — while calling for the universal coverage guarantee to be restored. In other words, she would actually fix the problem created by the Court ruling. This could contrast sharply with the GOP post-King approach, which, judging by recent GOP rhetoric, will likely be saddled with a tortured, incoherent storyline: Republicans will blame the loss of coverage for millions on Obamacare itself, while pledging to fix the problem even as their “solution” undermines the law further.

This is another sign that the post-King battle could spill into the presidential race. The states with the largest numbers of people also happen to be the top presidential battleground states. The GOP candidates will likely be asked to take a position on what should be done for all those people. Scott Walker is already signaling that he’ll demand that the federal government — i.e., Congressional Republicans — fix the problem. To my knowledge, Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio have not meaningfully weighed on on what should come next, which might not be easy: conservative base voters might want Republicans to do nothing, but doing nothing might alienate swing voters. What’s more, Bush and Rubio both come from Florida, which is home to the greatest number of people who stand to lose subsidies — 1.3 million — so they might be under more pressure to support a solution of sorts.

If Republicans do prove divided over what should be done to keep millions from losing coverage and to prevent insurance markets from melting down across the country, it will be interesting to see if Clinton tries to use the post-King battle to exacerbate those divisions.

Hillary Clinton finally figured out how to talk about being a woman in presidential politics // Chris Cillizza – June 15, 2015

Here's Hillary Clinton in an interview Sunday with the Des Moines Register's Jennifer Jacobs: "I expect to be judged on my merits, and the historic nature of my candidacy is one of the merits that I hope people take into account."

That's a sentence she never dared utter during her 2008 campaign when her gender -- and her historic chance to be the first woman to be the presidential nominee of either party -- seemed to be swept under the rug by a deeply misguided campaign strategy.

The idea -- I guess -- was that if Clinton put her gender at the forefront of the campaign, voters (especially male voters) would wonder if she was "up" to the job. (Whatever the heck that means.) That judgment, blamed on strategist Mark Penn but ultimately followed by Hillary, led to a Democratic primary campaign in which she was cast as the status quo while then-Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois was the change agent. And you know how that turned out.

What's amazing about that decision was that as far back as 2007, Clinton's most appealing trait to voters was the fact that she would have been the first woman ever elected president; in Gallup polling at the time, 22 percent said the historic nature of her candidacy was the single most appealing part of her bid -- more than double the share who named any other character trait.

Seven years later, the story was the same. Roughly one in five voters (18 percent) told Gallup in 2014 that Clinton's potential status as the first female president was the most attractive trait about her. As Gallup's Frank Newport wrote at the time:

Clearly Clinton's "unique selling proposition" is that she would be the first woman president. Nearly one in five Americans mention this historic possibility as a positive, including 22% of women, 27% of 18- to 29-year-olds, and 30% of Democrats.

Regardless of why they screwed it up last time, this version of the Clinton campaign appears to have figured out what had been staring them directly in the face for the last seven-plus years. From the emphasis on her status as a grandmother to the centrality of her own mother's struggles in her kickoff speech, Clinton is putting her gender at the core of this campaign.

That's of critical import not solely because it shows she learned the right lessons from the 2008 campaign but also because her gender (and the historic nature of her candidacy) provides Clinton her best possible response to the already underway Republican attack that she represents the past.

That hit has the potential to do severe damage to Clinton's chances of winning the White House next November. As we've written before in this space, presidential elections are almost always about the future and the candidate best able to present himself or herself as the right choice to lead the country into that future. Hillary's problem is that so much of who she is -- and so much of the strengths she carries as a candidate -- are rooted in the past. If and when she, at 67 and having spent the last two decades in the national spotlight, has to run against someone like Marco Rubio (age 43), it is going to be a real challenge for her to win the "future vs. past" argument.

Unless, that is, Clinton can show voters how electing her would be the biggest change the presidency has ever seen: After 43 men in the job, she would be the first woman.

"I may not be the youngest candidate in this race," Clinton said in her (re)announcement speech on Saturday in New York. "But I will be the youngest woman president in the history of the United States! And the first grandmother as well."

That's the exact right message for Clinton. It only took most of the past decade for her to find it.

Hillary Clinton balancing on the thin line between party and president // WaPo // Dan Balz – June 15, 2015

The Sunday dust-up over trade between Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) was a clash waiting to happen — and a revealing look at how the two candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination are likely to be circling one another in the coming months.

Where Sanders stands on the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP) agreement has long been clear. He is plainly and simply against it. Clinton's current position is ambiguous. She is skeptical but wants to see a completed agreement before she'll decided whether it's good or bad.

Where Sanders stands on giving the president fast-track authority also has been clear. He opposes it, as he opposes the trade deal itself. Where Clinton stands on that is no more clear after her Sunday comments.

She had more to say on Sunday than she's said before. She has allied herself with Democrats who currently oppose the treaty without committing herself to oppose the treaty herself. Ultimately, she could end up standing with President Obama, who has been abandoned by his own party on this, or with those who want to sink the deal.

Clinton had remained silent on trade as long as she could, probably longer. By claiming, correctly, that there was not a deal to support or oppose, she was looking for the maximum space to let the politics of the issue ripen or perhaps for the divisions within her party to lessen in some way.

When the fast-track legislation began to make its way through Congress, she was unwilling to say where she stood. Her advisers repeatedly said that fast-track was merely a process issue, not a substantive one, something for Congress to deal with but not one that she needed to weigh in on. The big issue, they said, was the trade agreement itself and that was still in negotiations.

Clinton had promoted an Asian trade deal as secretary of state — or at least the idea of it. She saw merit in trying to negotiate such a pact as part of the larger U.S. policy under Obama of paying more attention than previous administrations to the challenges of the rising power of China and the opportunities of deepening alliances with other Asian nations.

And backing free trade agreements runs in the family. Former president Bill Clinton had successfully campaigned for and won approval of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) despite strong opposition within his party.

As the political wars over the trade deal heated up, Clinton found what she thought a safe political haven in the space between concept and execution, between the meritorious idea of the 12-nation TPP and the specific details contained in a final agreement. Until those details were known — and it's not clear when the administration will complete the negotiations — she felt comfortable reserving her options.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two things intruded on that safe haven. One was the arrival of Sanders as an energized presidential candidate with a following on the left of the Democratic Party. He's not the only one among Clinton's opponents who wants to sink the trade deal. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley has the same position. But Sanders is getting the attention and drawing the crowds. His increasingly pointed criticism of Clinton has made her posture far less tenable.

Before he returned to Iowa for a weekend of campaigning, Sanders appeared at a breakfast hosted by the Christian Science Monitor. He was asked to offer criticisms of Clinton. He prefaced his answer by saying that, while he liked and respected Clinton, the two had serious disagreements that should be debated during the campaign.

"You know my view on the TPP," he said. "Trade policies have been disastrous. Secretary Clinton, if she's against this, we need her to speak out. Right now. Right now. And I don't understand how any candidate, Democrat, Republican, is not speaking out on that issue."

There was more, however, from Clinton's positions on the Keystone XL pipeline and the USA Patriot Act to his attacks on what he calls "the billionaire class" and what her policies are to deal with them. "What is the secretary's position?" he asked about each.

The other big change was the rebellion by House Democrats on Friday against the pact, a vote that has vastly complicated the administration's hopes of winning approval for fast-track authority and puts the entire trade deal in jeopardy.

When Clinton showed up in Des Moines on Sunday, she was forced by events and circumstances to take up the issue. What she did was tie herself to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other Democrats in the House. She urged Obama to listen to the concerns of Pelosi and others and use them as leverage in the negotiations over the trade agreement. As before, she said if the ultimate agreement falls short of her measuring sticks, she would oppose it.

Clinton is in a unique position. If she were to come out against the TPP now, it's likely that her opposition would scuttle it. Obama probably could not overcome the combined opposition from organized labor, many Democratic elected officials and his former secretary of state. But supporting it even in general terms provides a bigger opening for Sanders and others on the left.

Clinton isn't prepared to do either, at least not yet. At some point, she will have to signal up or down. For now she is trying to bridge the divide in her party, and the strains are showing.

Why Hillary is asking America to see her candidacy as 'historic' // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 15, 2015

In her presidential campaign kick-off speech and in a subsequent interview with Iowa media, Hillary Clinton leaned pretty hard into the notion that electing her president would represent a major historic breakthrough. Obviously this is about galvanizing female and younger voters who might be energized by the prospect of being swept up in a movement that elects the first female president.

But there may be another strategic goal here. The repeated emphasis on the historical nature of her candidacy could also be intended as a shield against seemingly unrelated GOP attacks that could prove potent: Republican suggestions that her age, generation and status as wife of a former president render her a candidate of the past, in contrast to the younger GOP White House hopefuls.

Here's Clinton, in an interview with the Des Moines Register:

Clinton said just the fact that she's running "is also very historic."

"I expect to be judged on my merits," she said, "and the historic nature of my candidacy is one of the merits that I hope people take into account."

In her speech on Saturday, Clinton stressed that her mother had been born before women had the right to vote, adding:

"I may not be the youngest candidate in this race. But I will be the youngest woman President in the history of the United States! And the first grandmother as well. And one additional advantage: You're won't see my hair turn white in the White House. I've been coloring it for years!"

I don't have any inside confirmation of this. But it probably isn't an accident that she noted that she'd be the first female president as a direct response to the fact that other candidates running for the White House are younger than she is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's what the argument will be, either explicitly or not: Even if it's true that Clinton comes from an older generation of politicians than some of her Republican and Democratic rivals, the election of a female president itself represents change.

Celinda Lake, a pollster who is widely respected among Democrats, tells me that focus groups she has conducted show this has the potential to be an effective rebuttal — particularly among the voter groups it appears intended for.

"The two cohorts who feel most strongly that it's time for a woman president, and appreciate the historical nature of this, are baby boomer females and their millennial daughters," says Lake, who has been doing research for the non-partisan Barbara Lee Family Foundation for years on how voters perceive female candidates for executive office.

"We've learned that the inherent idea that this would be the first woman president in and of itself communicates 'change' to people," Lake says.

The question of which candidates — and which party — represent the future and which represent the past is already a major flashpoint in the race. In her speech, Clinton said even the younger GOP candidates were in thrall to a hidebound vision, arguing that "they're all singing the same old song – a song called 'Yesterday.'" Republicans have stressed that Clinton is a leader of the past who would represent a third term of Obama.

In response to Clinton's speech, Marco Rubio released a video mocking Clinton's reference to the Beatles song, arguing that America cannot author the next chapter in its history "by going back to the leaders and the ideas of the past." Scott Walker has been sounding a similar generational note (one that also appears aimed at Jeb Bush). And in the Democratic Primary, Martin O'Malley has been suggesting he can speak to a younger generation of Democratic voters more effectively than Clinton can.

As Chris Cillizza notes, many of Clinton's strengths as a candidate are rooted in the past. But this could be undercut as a negative if voters appreciate how much historic ground would be broken by electing her.

Or, to expand on that a bit, if electing a female president inherently breaks new ground, that itself might put a forward-looking gloss on her experience, turning her longevity on the political scene into an undiluted reason to vote for her, Lake suggests.

"The Republicans are trying to exploit age and health and a 'third Obama term' and a 'third Clinton term' to say, 'more of the same,'" Lake says. "People think they voted for change in Obama, but he wasn't able to deliver change. So you need more experience to deliver change. She represents change and the ability to deliver on it."

Of course, this by itself is hardly enough, Lake adds: "It's got to be followed up by a specific vision for the economy, one that includes women and men." Which might explain why, in her speech, she repeatedly described economic proposals that might disproportionately benefit women — such as pay equity, a minimum wage hike, and universal pre-kindergarten — as "family" issues.

"'Family first' is the strongest economic theme out there right now," Lake says. "She's running as a champion of making the economy work for families. A woman can be a very credible voice of change on that message."

Bill Clinton's claim that Hillary did economic diplomacy because there was no Commerce Secretary // WaPo // Glenn Kessler – June 15, 2015

"She [Hillary Clinton] believed that part of the job as secretary of state was to advance America's economic interests around the world. And, for much of the time she was secretary, for a number of complex reasons, we didn't have [a] commerce secretary. And now we have got Penny Pritzker. And she's very vigorous and very good, I think. But we didn't have one. And so, if she hadn't been doing this economic diplomacy work, nobody would have been doing it."

— Former President Bill Clinton, interviewed on CNN's "State of the Union," June 14, 2015

Former president Clinton, in rebutting accusations that Hillary Clinton helped donors to the Clinton Foundation while serving as secretary of state, made an interesting point on one of the Sunday politics shows — that she had to engage in "economic diplomacy" because "much of time she was secretary," there was no Commerce Secretary.

This made little sense to us, and it's certainly easy to check. Was there such a gap in Commerce leadership that it was left to Clinton to conduct the administration's economic diplomacy?

The Facts

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Commerce Department is sometimes described as the broom closet of the federal bureaucracy, in that it contains a number of unrelated agencies, such as the Census Bureau, the National Weather Service, the Patent and Trademark office, the Economic Development Administration, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, and so forth. The notion that the commerce secretary was some sort of globe-trotting promoter of American industry only began to take hold in Clinton's administration, when Ron Brown became commerce secretary.

The Commerce Secretary, in the department's mission statement, "serves as the voice of U.S. business within the President's Cabinet." Commerce Department Order 1-1 says "the historic mission of the Department is 'to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce' of the United States."

Meanwhile, the State Department has an economics unit and also is quite involved in international economic issues; the official duties of the Secretary of State includes "promotes beneficial economic intercourse between the United States and other countries."

International economics is represented in the department at the level of undersecretary of state. The undersecretary of state is expected to engage in economic diplomacy, charged with "implementing economic growth, energy, agricultural, oceans, environmental, and science and technology policies," the department's Web site says. The State Department, for instance, is the lead agency on the APEC (Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation) conference.

Of course, the real heavy lifting on international economic matters is done by the Treasury Secretary–and international trade negotiations are handled by the U.S. Trade Representative. Former Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner might be surprised to learn that if Hillary Clinton "hadn't been doing this economic diplomacy work, nobody would have been doing it," as her husband put it.

In President Obama's first term, there were two commerce secretaries:

Gary F. Locke, former governor of Washington, who served from March 26, 2009, to August 1, 2011, when he became ambassador to China.

John E. Byson, former business executive, who served from Oct. 21, 2011, to June 21, 2012, when he resigned for health reasons. (He took a medical leave of absence starting June 11.)

In between Locke and Byson, Deputy Secretary Rebecca Blank served as acting secretary, a role she filled after Byson's departure as well. Penny Prizker became secretary on June 26, 2013, about four months after Clinton stepped down.

Clinton was secretary of state from Jan. 21, 2009, to Feb. 1, 2013 — essentially 48 months. As we have shown, there was a confirmed commerce secretary for all but 12 months of that period. So that's a ratio of 3 to 1 when a commerce secretary was in office at the same time as Clinton.

Byson may not have had as much of chance to have an impact, but by most accounts Locke did a pretty good job. Here's what Clinton said when she swore him in as ambassador to China:

"He helped improve the lives of the people of Washington and of the United States. He was a great job creator in Washington during two national recessions. He has helped to lead our efforts to increase U.S. exports. He has brought the Census in on time and under budget, an unheard of accomplishment. He's brought comprehensive patent reform legislation closer to passage than it has in decades."

Representatives of former president Clinton declined to provide an on-the-record response.

The Pinocchio Test

Former President Clinton exaggerated when he claimed that for "much of the time she was secretary," there was no commerce secretary. For three out of the four years, there was a Senate-confirmed commerce secretary sitting near Hillary Clinton at Cabinet meetings. Moreover, the secretary of state is supposed to engage in economic diplomacy, whether or not there is a commerce secretary.

Yes, there was some turnover in the leadership of the commerce department. But Clinton's assertion that if not for Hillary Clinton, "nobody would have been doing" economic diplomacy is quite a stretch, given the dominant role of the Treasury Secretary on international economic issues. That comment tipped this rating toward Three Pinocchios.

Clinton says her wealth is 'secondary' concern for voters // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton countered criticism that her personal wealth undermines a populist campaign message focused on the economic problems of everyday Americans, saying on Monday that her family fortune is "secondary" to most voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't think Americans are against success," she told reporters in Concord, New Hampshire. "Those of us who do have opportunities ought to be doing more to help other people do the same."

Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, have made hundreds of millions of dollars since leaving the White House from paid speeches— a fortune that even she has struggled to explain.

Last year, she stumbled into a storm of political criticism after saying her family was "dead broke" at the end of her husband's second term. Though in deep debt due to legal fees from various controversies, Clinton quickly moved the couple into the top 1 percent with her book sales and speaking fees.

Last month, the couple reported that they earned more than $30 million in speaking fees and book royalties since January 2014.

In New Hampshire on Monday, Clinton seemed more comfortable acknowledging her wealth, describing her family as "blessed." But she also highlighted her middle class roots, pointing out that both she and her husband had federal college loans to pay off.

"What (voters) are interested in is who's going to fight for them," she said. "I want everybody to have the same opportunities that I had and my husband had."

While the opening days of her campaign have stressed Clinton's family and career history, her personal fortune has gone largely unmentioned.

Her remarks on Monday came in the midst of a campaign launch focused on her personal biography, particularly her mother's impoverished upbringing, as a way of reintroducing one of the country's best known political figures as a fighter for struggling families left behind by the economic recovery.

On Monday, she focused the first major policy proposal of her campaign on universal pre-K education — an issue championed both by liberal voices in her party, as well as by more conservative governors in Republican-led states, including Texas.

Speaking to parents and children at a YMCA, she promised that as president she would make "high quality preschool" available for all 4-year-old children in the next decade, double federal money for early Head Start programs, and implement a tax cut to help parents with the costs of raising children under age 3.

That proposal is one item on a wish-list of progressive policies Clinton has backed over the past three days, as part of her vision of a more "inclusive economy."

"Prosperity cannot be just for CEOs and hedge fund managers," she told hundreds of supporters Monday in a Concord barn.

Those Wall Street financiers include members of her immediate family.

Her son-in-law Marc Mezvinsky has leveraged family ties to raise money from investors for his hedge fund. Her daughter, Chelsea, also worked at a hedge fund founded by a major Clinton campaign donor.

Clinton was paid to speak to financial firms such as Deutsche Bank and Ameriprise Financial. One of her final paid speeches was delivered in March to eBay, which paid her $315,000, records show.

Republicans have spent months questioning how the Clinton family has leveraged political connections into personal cash— criticism that may be having some impact on early perceptions of her candidacy.

About 47 percent of Americans said Clinton cares about people like them in a CNN/ORC poll released earlier this month, down from 53 percent in the same poll last summer. An ABC News/Washington Post poll released the same day found a slight decline in the past year on a similar question, with 49 percent saying Clinton "understands the problems of people like you" and 46 percent saying she doesn't.

Republicans are flipping charges successfully leveled against their party in the last presidential race. In 2012, Republican nominee Mitt Romney, the wealthy co-founder of private equity firm Bain Capital LLC, found his presidential bid undermined by Democratic attack ads painting him as a heartless plutocrat.

"Hillary Clinton has to expect the same kind of treatment," Romney said Monday, in an interview on MSNBC. "How could she get out there and sell a populist message when she makes in one hour a multiple of what the average American will make in a year?"

Clinton campaign denies access to pool reporter // Politico // Dylan Byers – June 15, 2015

The Hillary Clinton campaign denied access to the print pool reporter on Monday, reigniting reporters' longstanding concerns about the campaign's commitment to running an open and transparent campaign.

David Martosko, the U.S. political editor for London's Daily Mail, reported showing up at the campaign's breakfast stop in New Hampshire only to be told that he would not be allowed to pool the day's events. Pool reporters are responsible for sending reports from the trail to the rest of the press corps.

"Your pooler showed up at the Puritan Backroom in Manchester on a rainy New Hampshire morning at 7:45 and was greeted in the parking lot by Meredith Thatcher, a press staffer with the New Hampshire Democratic Party. Thatcher told your pooler that he wasn't the approved print pool reporter for today's pooled events," Martosko reported in his first pool report. (Note: Thatcher is actually a press staffer for "Hillary for New Hampshire," not the state's Democratic Party.)

"Asked to call her boss, Harrell Kirstein, she did so and then reported: 'So I'm afraid it's a no. You're not on the list.' She said [campaign press secretary] Nick Merrill should be phoned with questions," Martosko continued. "Asked if the print pooler was being prohibited from getting on either of the pool vans, Thatcher replied: 'I'm afraid that's right.' Asked why, she responded: 'All I know is what Harrell has told me. I got an email saying the print pooler would be changed for today. Sorry.'"

Denied a ride in the pool van, Martosko told Thatcher that he would drive to the first campaign stop in Rochester on his own, "in the hope that things would be sorted out during the 75-minute drive."

Reached via email, Martosko declined to comment. He apologized for any typos, noting, "I'm dictating to phone as I drive." Daily Mail spokesperson Sean Walsh said the organization is "seeking an explanation from the Clinton campaign as to why this occurred as Mr. Martosko was scheduled to be the designated print pool reporter in New Hampshire this morning."

Merrill, the campaign's traveling press secretary, did not respond to a request for comment. However, he did provide an additional explanation to Martosko, which Martosko relayed in a report on The Daily Mail's website:

Merrill said that the campaign's position is that the Daily Mail does not qualify because it has not yet been added to the White House's regular print pool – something Martosko informed him was a timing issue, not a White House choice, since Francesca Chambers, the Mail's White House correspondent, has been vetted and has a hard pass. ... 'We're just trying to follow the same process and system the White House has,' said Merrill. ... Merrill then insisted that the decision had 'nothing to do' with the campaign considering the Daily Mail foreign press. ... 'We don't consider you foreign press,' he said. ... Merrill then added; 'This isn't about you. It's about a larger...' and did not continue his sentence. ... Merrill later insisted that his reasons were not based on the foreign-press question, but that the campaign simply wanted a day to 'have a conversation' about how to proceed.

UPDATE (9:50 a.m.): Merrill emailed:

"We want a happy press corps as much as the press corps does. And we work very hard to achieve that in tandem with them. It's a long campaign, and we are going to do our best to find equilibrium and best accommodate interest from as many news outlets as possible, given the space limitations of our events."

UPDATE (11:01 a.m.): Martosko filed the following pool report:

After some confusion about the location of the morning's early childhood education summit in Rochester, NH, your pooled determined that it was at the YMCA of Strafford County and arrived at about 10:20. ... Secret Service at the main entrance refused to let your pooler in and advised to go in through another entrance near a playground. ... Visiting that doorway, another agent asked for your pooler's name and outlet, to which the pool replied "David Martosko with The Daily Mail." A voice from behind the door, whom your pool later learned was the head of Mrs. Clinton's Secret Service detail, was heard saying "Oh. No." ... The first agent sent your pooler back to the front door, advising that the head of the detail insisted. At the front door again, your pooler was asked to wait while the first agent on duty checked to see if the pool would be admitted. ... The answer: "No. You can't come in."

Pooler was advised by that Secret Service agent that he had contacted someone "with the campaign" named "Pollard," who personally said no, your pooler could not come in. It's unclear who Pollard is. ... Your pooler asked if he could come inside to use the restroom. The Secret Service agent advised that the area had been swept already, so he should "hit the woods." ... Pool saw a WMUR-TV truck outside and confirmed with a reporter from a competing local station that there were indeed pool journalist inside from photo and video. ... With a light rain falling, your pooler went back to his rental car to file this report, after counting about 210 cars in the parking lots and on the street. ... Both press pool vans from Manchester were visible outside, along with the now-famous black

Hillary Clinton's super PAC nabs 2 veteran pollsters // Politico // Annie Karni – June 15, 2015

Priorities USA Action, the Democratic super PAC backing Hillary Clinton's campaign, has hired two pollsters: Jefrey Pollock, founding partner and president of Global Strategy Group, and Geoff Garin, who oversaw polling on Clinton's 2008 campaign after pollster Mark Penn was pushed out.

Both pollsters worked for Priorities in 2012, when the super PAC supported Obama's reelection campaign. Pollock's firm also worked on some of the few Democratic wins in the 2014 midterm elections, including New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo's reelection campaign and Connecticut Gov. Dannel Malloy's reelection campaign.

"We have the key pieces in place that will help shape the 2016 landscape and define the choice Americans will make on Election Day," Guy Cecil, Priorities' chief strategist, said in a statement. "We're also proud to have cornered the market on pollsters with unique ways to spell Jeff."

The pollsters have been working with Priorities and participating in conference calls for a few months. Their hiring was confirmed to POLITICO after a shakeup of the super PAC's leadership.

In May, Cecil, who came in to manage Clinton's 2008 campaign after a shakeup, took over from Obama holdover Jim Messina.

And last month, Anne Caprara joined the PAC from Emily's List, which works to elect pro-choice Democratic women to office. She replaced executive director Buffy Wicks, who was recruited by the Clinton campaign for a senior level job. Amid the restructuring, longtime Clinton defender David Brock rejoined the board after resigning last February because of internal disputes.

Some of Hillary Clinton's Libya emails said to be withheld from Benghazi Committee // Politico // Rachel Bade – June 15, 2015

House GOP Benghazi investigators have discovered additional Libya communications between Sidney Blumenthal and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, a congressional source told POLITICO — suggesting that either the State Department or the 2016 Democratic presidential contender withheld correspondence the panel had subpoenaed.

Blumenthal — a longtime Clinton family friend who is set to testify before the committee behind closed doors Tuesday morning — recently gave the House Select Committee on Benghazi his Libya-related emails after the panel had quietly subpoenaed them.

Among those were several emails concerning Libya between Blumenthal and Clinton that had not been previously turned over by State. Clinton has said she gave all her work-related correspondence, kept on her personal email server, to the State Department. State was then tasked with going through the emails and giving the panel relevant correspondence. Department officials turned up about 300 emails related to Benghazi.

The source did not know whether Clinton had turned the emails over to State and State did not provide them, or whether Clinton failed to hand over the correspondence.

A State Department spokesman downplayed the discovery and said the agency gave the panel what it asked for.

"The Department is working diligently to publish to its public website all of the emails received from former Secretary Clinton through the FOIA process," Alec Gerlach said in a statement. "We provided the Committee with a subset of documents that matched its request and will continue to work with them going forward. Secretary Kerry has been clear that the State Department will be both transparent and thorough in its obligations to the public on this matter."

Blumenthal's attorney, James Cole, and Clinton's attorney, David Kendall, did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

The committee has subpoenaed Clinton's Libya-related emails. But because she used a personal server, her lawyer decided which emails constituted "official" communications and provided them to the State Department before they were released to the committee and publicly.

Hillary Clinton dismisses trade authority as 'process issue' // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While the political world's attention was focused on Jeb Bush's presidential announcement 1,500 miles to the south in Miami, Hillary Clinton brought her stump speech to New Hampshire and refused to be pinned down on her views of a trade deal that has raised progressives' ire.

Clinton's one-day swing through this state that buoyed her politically in 2008 is part of the Democratic front-runner's week-long tour of the four early-voting states following her campaign's first large rally in New York City on Saturday.

The former secretary of state spoke at a campaign launch party at a rainy apple orchard here, after holding a meeting at a YMCA in Rochester, N.H.

After delivering a version of her standard stump speech in Concord, Clinton held a rare 18-minute news conference. She again danced around the trade issue and tried to minimize the importance of her views about whether President Barack Obama should have fast-track authority to negotiate trade pacts.

"The TPA is a process issue. The issue for me is what's in the deal" she said. "I think this is a chance to use this leverage so that the deal does become one that more Americans and members of Congress can vote for."

"I believe that you take whatever happens to you in a negotiation, and you leverage it," she said minutes later when pressed again on the topic.

Democratic rival Martin O'Malley quickly seized on what he called Clinton's political dodge on the Trans-Pacific Partnership pact, which he and progressives in Congress have come out strongly against.

"For the thousands of American workers whose jobs are on the line with TPP, fast track is not a 'process' issue, it's a straightforward vote on their future and their livelihood," O'Malley aide Lis Smith said in a statement.

Just hours earlier, Clinton unveiled one of the first detailed policy proposals of her campaign, calling for universal preschool and new federal funding for the states that expand their preschool programs for low- and medium-income families.

New Hampshire, the second-voting state that has been politically kind to both Clinton and her husband in the past, was one of six states that did not provide any funding for preschool in the last fiscal year.

Clinton's proposal would aim to provide high-quality preschool access to all 4-year-olds within the next decade, and the former secretary of state also proposed doubling investment in the Early Head Start and Early Head Start-Child Care programs.

During her speech in Concord, Clinton also defended the records of both her husband Bill Clinton and Obama, while criticizing Republicans.

"The records of Bill Clinton and Barack Obama of cleaning up the messes the inherited is something that speaks to Democratic values, and it's something that is historically factual. The other side is coming back with more of the same," she said.

Clinton also repeated her now-familiar calls to rid politics of unaccountable money, to make voting easier for young citizens and minorities, and to lessen the debt burden on students.

Clinton's appearance came as Bush, the son of one president and the brother of another, was launching his much-anticipated campaign. But she demurred when asked to provide Bush advice on running a campaign that distinguishes himself from his family name.

"That's a very tempting question to answer," she said, "But I won't."

Clinton campaign kicks off amid boiling press frustrations // Politico // Dylan Byers – June 15, 2015

Less than 48 hours out from its formal launch, the Hillary Clinton campaign has twice managed to anger the traveling press corps by denying access to the candidate.

Monday's dust-up, in which the print pool reporter was denied access for ambiguous reasons, came just one day after the campaign had angered reporters by keeping them away from Clinton's impromptu exchange with local New Hampshire residents.

On Sunday evening, the pool reportedly "threw a fit" after it missed an exchange between Clinton and residents of Burlington, Iowa, outside a private residence where the candidate had been holding a question-and-answer session with voters.

"The pool was kept in the backyard, and did not get to see Clinton walk out of the event and greet a group of neighbors who were across the street," The Boston Globe's Annie Linskey wrote in her pool report. "Neighbors later confirmed this occurred. Also, a local CBS news camera caught the exchange."

"The pool threw a fit when she heard Clinton had left the house," Linskey wrote. "Your pooler got outside fast enough to see Clinton drive away."

"NOTE FOR FUTURE HOUSE PARTIES," Linksey added. "POOL MUST be held in FRONT of the event, [not] in the back."

Thirteen hours later, pool reporter David Martosko, of The Daily Mail, showed up at the campaign's breakfast stop in New Hampshire and was told by one of the campaign's local press staffers that he would not be allowed to pool the day's events. Martosko decided to follow Clinton to her first campaign stop anyway, "in the hope that things would be sorted out during the 75-minute drive." (See the full details on that in our last post.)

Nick Merrill, the Clinton campaign's traveling press secretary, has yet to provide a clear explanation regarding the restriction. Martosko was initially informed by the state staffer that he was not allowed on because he works for a non-U.S. publication, though Merrill has stressed that the campaign does not consider Martosko foreign press.

In a statement Monday, he said only that the campaign wants "a happy press corps as much as the press corps does. And we work very hard to achieve that in tandem with them. It's a long campaign, and we are going to do our best to find equilibrium and best accommodate interest from as many news outlets as possible, given the space limitations of our events."

Whatever the case, the back-to-back dustups are drawing negative attention to a campaign already suffering from the perception that it has avoided or restricted the press wherever possible. In the two months leading up to Saturday's launch, Clinton did not grant members of the press a single interview.

Finally, on Sunday, Clinton sat down with Iowa journalists Jennifer Jacobs (of the Des Moines Register) and Kay Henderson (of Radio Iowa) for her first interviews of the campaign.

Hillary Clinton = Jeb Bush? // Politico // Annie Karni & Gabriel Debenedetti – June 15, 2015

One candidate vowed to “ban discrimination against LGBT Americans” and “make preschool and quality childcare available to every child in America.” The other pledged to “take Washington … out of the business of causing problems” and “get back on the side of free enterprise and free people.” She spoke in lists and bullet points; he stuck to broad brushstrokes.

While their visions for America couldn’t be more different, the dueling kickoff rallies of Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush — coming just 52 hours apart after years of anticipation in both parties — served to underscore a striking fact: Their political problems are remarkably similar.

“Both are the darlings of their respective party’s elites, unequaled fundraisers, and members of the nation’s political oligarchy,” noted Democratic strategist Hank Scheinkopf, who in the past has advised Bill Clinton.

“Both, if they are the nominees of their respective parties, need to win the same states. And while their rivals in both parties are using either center-right or center-left populist rhetoric, they have both shown propensity to cleave for life to the center.”

Then there’s the dynastic factor. A central struggle for both is escaping their famous families — and their political operations have accordingly marketed the candidates around their first names only: Clinton’s logo is a squat blue “H” pierced by a red arrow, while Bush’s is a big red “Jeb” punctuated by an exclamation point.

And while neither has created much distance from his or her family, both have inched away from their kins’ policy legacies. Hillary Clinton proposed effectively undoing some of Bill Clinton’s work on criminal justice, and Jeb Bush has struggled to answer questions about whether he would follow George W. Bush’s path in Iraq.

Clinton, 67, and Bush, 62, also face questions about their age, particularly from rivals Martin O’Malley, 52, and Marco Rubio, 44, respectively, who’ve made explicitly generational pitches. And while both campaigns will be run by well-respected 30-something party operatives instead of the legions of family loyalists on offer — Robby Mook for Clinton and Danny Diaz for Bush — the candidates themselves are shaking off the rust that comes from not having run full-scale political operations in years — eight for Clinton, 14 for Bush.

And rust isn’t the only issue. Clinton, for all her vast experience in the public eye, has won just two elections in her life: her 2000 New York Senate race against Republican patsy Rick Lazio, and her easy re-election in 2006; Bush hasn't faced a truly tough opponent since his Florida gubernatorial loss in 1994. So as they try to get back into proverbial fighting shape by losing weight, there's the lingering question of whether either was truly ever much of a candidate at all.

Their opponents employ many of the same tactics, too. As Clinton fends off Bernie Sanders' attacks on her trade contortions and Martin O'Malley digs at her Wall Street ties, Jeb will be getting blasted daily by the likes of Ted Cruz and Rand Paul on immigration and the Common Core.

All that aside, one major reality distinguishes these two would-be general election foes: Bush is far from the dominating front-runner, while Clinton faces no serious threat.

Hillary Clinton dismisses trade authority as 'process issue'

"On the Republican side, you have a 19-person field, ten of them who have a plausible path to get nominated," said Democratic strategist and lobbyist Steve Elmendorf, who advised Clinton's 2008 campaign. "You have a four-person field on the Democratic side, and the challenge for the other three people running is that they have to make the case for how they get to the White House."

As for the early primary states, "she has the establishment locked down" in New Hampshire far more than Jeb Bush does there, noted David Carney, a local Republican strategist. "He'll never be in a position like Hillary where the party establishment is all locked up for him."

While Clinton has been polling around 60 percent nationally, far ahead of any Democratic competitor, Bush has been stuck around 10 percent. He's a member of the Republican field's top tier — along with Rubio and Scott Walker — but seven candidates, including those three, sit between 8 and 13 percent in the Huffington Post Pollster average of national polls, and Bush faces a serious uphill struggle in Iowa, where he'll be lucky to come in third.

Still, Bush has one more thing in common with Clinton that could give him an edge: money, and lots of it.

"They both have deep, deep, deep networks that they've inherited at some level, or built on their own," explained one Clinton ally on Wall Street, noting that their fundraising prowess may be the strongest parallel of all.

While Bush has been focused on raising large amounts of money for his supportive super PAC, Clinton has been raising cash in smaller increments for her campaign itself. They each delayed their formal kickoffs to spent time raising the considerable amounts of money they would need to claim the White House, and in some cases their super PACs have even thought about targeting the same Wall Street-adjacent donors, like former New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg.

They share close ties to the financial industry — Bush because of his work at Lehman Brothers and Barclay's and Clinton because of her time as a senator from New York — and both expected to raise well over $1 billion between their campaigns and super PACs should they become the nominees. Bush's super PAC is expected to bring in around $100 million by the end of May, and Clinton is hoping to raise that much for her campaign in 2015 alone. Their nearest rivals will likely raise mere fractions of those amounts.

"It's hard for the other candidates," said the New York Democrat. "But if you're Hillary or Jeb at this stage, it's pretty easy money."

Hillary Clinton Proposes More Funding for Early Childhood Education // Bloom berg News // Jennifer Epstein – June 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton embraced her new role as a grandmother and her longer-term one as a child advocate on Monday, offering up proposals on early childhood education including doubling funding for Head Start.

It was Clinton's first set of policy proposals kicking off a summer of planned rollouts. Speaking at a YMCA in Rochester, N.H., Clinton revealed some details of the approach she'd take if elected, including the goal of ensuring that "in the next 10 years every 4-year-old has access to high-quality preschool."

Clinton, who formally launched her campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination on Saturday, said she hopes to double funding for Head Start and for the early Head Start grant program, and supports a middle-class tax cut "that can go toward helping parents pay for quality child care."

"Republicans aren't just missing the boat on early childhood education, they're trying to sink it."

Republicans, she said, have taken the wrong approach in supporting tax breaks for oil companies and hedge fund managers while cutting funding for programs that support young children.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Republicans aren't just missing the boat on early childhood education, they're trying to sink it," she said. "Republicans took care of those at the top and went after the kids."

After getting a question from a grandmother who is taking care of her young grandchildren, who she said would have otherwise been taken into the state's custody "because of addiction," Clinton added to her position, saying she would make sure to "extend every program, every tax break, everything we do to people who are taking care of kids."

The former secretary of state and first lady got emotional as she heard from the woman, who described her situation as "painful" and said she has half a dozen friends parenting their grandchildren.

"It is heartbreaking," Clinton said, mentioning the stories of drug addiction she said she's heard at every stop along the campaign trail over the past two months. "I think you're very brave and very loving to take on this responsibility."

Clinton also took a question about educating older kids, especially those with ADHD and other attention disorders. While some do need medications, "medicating kids because we have not yet figured out how to deal with their particular needs" is not the right approach.

Aides said Clinton will also roll out a comprehensive childcare agenda in the coming weeks aimed at ensuring that children from birth to age 3 have access to quality care.

Hillary Clinton Backs Fast-Track on Obama's Trade Deals // HuffPo // Eric Zuesse – June 15, 2015

On Sunday, June 14th, Hillary Clinton came out publicly for the first time in support of President Obama's trade-deals -- TPP with Asia, TTIP with Europe, and on TISA with all nations to lower the standards on banking and insurance and to privatize government services.

What's at issue in Congress right now -- and thus what she was responding to -- is whether or not to grant U.S. President Barack Obama the "Fast Track Trade Promotion Authority," which will produce expedited passage for his trade-deals; the trade-deals themselves are not even before Congress yet, and have not even been made public, though the first one up for consideration will be TPP with Asia; but that deal, like the others, will virtually certainly go down to defeat unless the president first wins "Fast Track," which is the issue now.

The reason "Fast Track" is the issue now before Congress, is that it's actually the only feasible way for Obama to be able to win congressional passage of TPP or of any of his big-three trade-deals. It's crucial because it reduces the Constitutionally required two-thirds of Senators voting for a given trade-deal, down to merely 50% of Senators (plus VP Joe Biden) needed to vote for it, in order for the deal to become U.S. law -- and there is no way possible for this Senate to vote two-thirds for either TPP with Asia, TTIP with Europe, or TISA for "Services." But 50% can safely be assured (especially with the gargantuan political-campaign donations that are pouring into Congress to back it).

Clinton said that it's so important for Obama to win Fast Track authority, that, "I am willing to try now to see whether you can push to get rid of the objectionable parts, to drive a harder bargain on some of the other parts," so that Congress will grant the president Fast Track Trade promotion Authority. (Her underlying assumption, which she knows to be false, is that to "drive a harder bargain" is "a harder bargain" against foreign nations, not against the publics in both the U.S. and all nations. International corporations will benefit enormously. But Obama is not negotiating against them; he's negotiating against the public, for the international corporations.)

She said that the president should work with congressional Democrats "starting with Nancy Pelosi," to pass Fast Track (though she judiciously avoided even mentioning "Fast Track," because she's aiming for low-information liberal voters, who -- like low-information conservative voters -- don't even know what the issues actually are, and can therefore be easily swayed by her words, regardless of what the issues are).

According to the pseudonymous blogger "Gaius Publius," who is very well connected with Democrats in Congress and with their aides: "According to two sources, in private Pelosi is working 'almost on a daily basis' to get Fast Track to pass, and with it, TPP."

He further reports: "White House's secret weapon on trade: Nancy Pelosi. Administration officials have been so impressed by Nancy Pelosi's approach to negotiations over giving president Barack Obama 'fast-track' trade authority that they've started to consider a crazy possibility: She could even vote for it herself. But only if she has to."

He explains that she won't vote for it herself unless only a single additional 'Democratic' House member (namely, her own vote) is needed in order to get the bill over the hump and to the president's desk to sign Fast Track into law. He reports that, "All she cares about, based on her reported behavior, is controlling her own appearance, her brand, as being 'pro-worker,'" so that she won't be able to be attacked in a Democratic primary by someone who is running to the left of her, saying "You sold us out!"

In other words: Nancy Pelosi already is working hand-in-glove with the White House on this fast-track matter. Pelosi wants these trade-deals to become U.S. law, just as much as does Hillary Clinton. But, of course, Democratic voters generally don't know this (and she won't tell them).

A subsequent headline on the matter was, "Gaius Publius: Nancy Pelosi Got a TPP Talking-To from Her Caucus, Plus Where We Are on Fast Track." It reported the anger on the part of many House Democrats who don't like Pelosi's double-dealing on this: they were enraged that she wanted Obama to win Fast Track. They're strongly against it. It's why the vote of Friday was disastrous for the president.

Pelosi tried to do everything she possibly could in order to win Fast Track for the president. Here is how she helped, as described by "Gaius Publius":

In order for any law to be placed upon the president's desk for his signature, both houses of Congress -- both the Senate and the House -- need first to agree 100% on the contents of the bill, because a president cannot sign two different versions, only one, final, version, which has passed both houses the same. Then, he can sign it.

The Senate has already voted for a "Fast Track" that includes something called "Trade Adjustment Assistance" (TAA), which will retrain some of the U.S. workers who will lose their jobs to foreigners on account of these deals. Democrats in the Senate demanded TAA. (I previously explained how that happened.) The leader of the Senate, Republican Mitch McConnell, had to agree with it in order to achieve any sort of Fast Track that could pass in the Senate, where few Democrats like what they've seen of TPP -- the draft that will come up first if the president first wins Fast Track. McConnell demanded from Senate Democrats that the federal money to pay for TAA would come out of the hides of Medicare benificiaries; and, though reluctantly, enough Democrats in the U.S. Senate went along with that so the bill could pass in the Senate, and then go on to the House, where it was voted down on Friday.

What's key is that, because in the House, Democrats voted overwhelmingly against TAA (the version that passed in the Senate, with the Medicare cuts), there's nothing now that can go directly to the president for his signature. (This was probably what Harry Reid in the Senate had expected and planned.) House Republicans were shocked; Democrats in the House weren't accepting the bill that had obtained the support of enough Democrats in the Senate for it to pass in the Senate.

Republicans, on Friday, June 12th, responded to that failure (for them and the president) by holding an immediate vote on Fast Track without any TAA in it; and it barely passed in the House. However, it cannot go to the president's desk, because it's a different bill than the one the Senate had approved. This was therefore just a symbolic 'win' for House Republicans: it didn't move anything toward the president's desk.

The news media have headlined about Hillary Clinton's statement, "Clinton urges Obama to work with Pelosi on trade deal," but Obama has already been doing, and still is doing, precisely that. And the press even headlined things like "Hillary Clinton snubs Obama on trade deal," which is simply false. Even the headlines sometimes lie.

Hillary Clinton actually supports Barack Obama's trade-policy, and even supports the way in which he is trying to get it through Congress. However, the news-media didn't report it that way.

Ms. Clinton is repeating her earlier tactics, in 2008, when she tried to give the impression that she had opposed her husband Bill Clinton's NAFTA, though in fact she had earlier bragged about how great it was for the country and claimed it as if it were her own. As everyone knows, the Clinton foundation, the Clintons personally, and the Clinton campaign, and her past political career, have been financed very heavily by the very same international corporations and Wall Street banks, and their lobbying firms and accounting firms, that are now lobbying intensely for President Obama to win Fast Track, and for him ultimately to win all three of his mega-corporate trade deals: TPP, TTIP, and TISA.

One independent economic analysis has been done of TPP, and one has been done on TTIP. Both show huge U.S. job-losses and considerable boost to the profits of U.S.-based international corporations.

However, though those U.S. job-losses are the impacts that are receiving all of the media attention (such as TAA, to compensate for some of those job-losses), there is an even bigger issue, which is that all of these trade-deals would transfer democratic U.S. government sovereignty to regulate in the interests of the public -- sovereignty to protect food-safety, product-safety, workers' rights, and the environment, among other things -- over to panels of international lawyers, whose careers will depend upon how well they serve international corporations. Those 'arbitrators' will come up with rulings that will not be able to be appealed to any court in any democracy at all. The worst aspect of these 'trade' deals would thus be that transfer of democratic national sovereignty to international corporate sovereignty. It would replace national democracies with an internattional corporate dictatorship -- an international fascist world government. And, just like Barack Obama and other Republicans, Hillary Clinton favors it. (Here is the back-story of how and why.) However, for her to come right out and admit this would be suicidal for anyone who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination. (It would hand the nomination to Bernie Sanders, whose whole career has been opposed to these types of 'trade' deals.) After all: it was Barack Obama himself, in his primary camppaign in 2008 against Clinton, who said, "Yesterday, Sen. Clinton also said I'm wrong to point out that she once supported NAFTA. But the fact is, she was saying great things about NAFTA until she started running for president." He was pretending to oppose these types of 'trade' deals, just as she was. Only he was much more skillful at it than she is. But they both have the same financial backers, who give also very heavily -- and often even more -- to the Republican Party.

Whereas most Democrats in Congress try to do a decent job for the American people (and this statement is based upon their voting-records -- including their having thus far beaten back the Republicans, including Obama, on Fast Track), most Democrats who run for president (just like virtually all Republicans who do) are much more interested in doing a terrific job for their biggest donors. There is (sad to say) nothing illegal about that. Whether there is anything immoral about it is (also sad to say) debated. However, voters should be skeptical of the honesty of any politician -- especially if the politician is running for congress or (even more) for the White House. The past record should be the sole basis for evaluating any candidate for national office; don't trust merely what they now are saying. To believe a candidate's words, divorced from their proven record in public office, including things that they said previously, would be foolish. It also would assist the corruptness that already exists. And it would make immeasurably more difficult any political victory for any honest person to win those offices; so, it's extremely unpatriotic. If a voter doesn't have the time to investigate on his own regarding a particular election, that person would be more patriotic to simply not vote, regarding that particular political post. After all: one can leave a ballot-line blank, which allows better-informed individuals to make that given judgment. Because the nation's fate depends upon that judgment.

But anyway, don't believe everything you read or hear -- not even this (and I'll be delighted if you will check out every source I've linked to, because I am honest; that's my top commitment -- and it's also why I always link to my main sources, so that they can be easily accessed). It's almost impossible to be successful as a journalist, regarding serious matters such as these, and to be employable by large-audience, well-financed, news-media (so I am entirely independent), because news-media are backed by the corporations that advertise in them, including by their 'non-profit' foundations. For example, pro-publica, which, like virtually all news-media, receives all of my news-reports and commentaries, just recently placed mine on their spam-list. They won't report to their readers the types of things that I customarily send to them and report. The level of public trust may be going down, but it still is way too high. One learns this, as an independent journalist, on important issues, such as international matters: the public is too trusting. Scoundrels benefit enormously from that excess of trust. By contrast, decent politicians suffer major competitive disadvantage from the excess of trust. Excess of trust gives the competitive advantage to liars. Unfortunately, ours is not a society in which trust by the public is warranted. Maybe it once was; it's not now.

Please pass this along to friends, and post it to Facebook and Twitter, so that others can know, too, that despite what the news-media might be saying, Hillary Clinton supports Barack Obama's 'trade' agenda, which is actually his mega-corporate agenda -- which she has always shared along with him. If your friends are going to support her, at least they ought to know what they are supporting. The links here provide access to the facts.

45 times Secretary Clinton pushed the trade bill she now opposes // CNN // Jake Tapper – June 15, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, as a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, seems reluctant to take a firm position on an issue dividing her party: whether President Obama should have fast-track trading authority for the immense trade deal he has been negotiating, the Trans-Pacific Partnership. With some progressive voters eyeing her with some skepticism, and facing a challenge (such as it is) from candidates on her left, she is being advised to tack in that direction.

President Obama has been pushing hard for the deal, while Democrats in the House of Representatives on Friday revolted and voted against a key part of the legislation. One told me, "there was a very strong concern about the lost jobs and growing income inequality," adding, pointedly: "Ms. Clinton should take notice."

She clearly did. After first dodging the issue, on Sunday in Iowa, Clinton said that "the President should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with (House Minority Leader) Nancy Pelosi, who have expressed their concerns about the impact that a weak agreement would have on our workers, to make sure we get the best, strongest deal possible. And if we don't get it, there should be no deal."

Clinton said, "there are some specifics in there that could and should be changed. So I am hoping that's what happens now -- let's take the lemons and turn it into lemonade."

But as members of the Obama administration can attest, Clinton was one of the leading drivers of the TPP when Secretary of State. Here are 45 instances when she approvingly invoked the trade bill about which she is now expressing concerns:

1. January 31, 2013: Remarks on American Leadership at the Council on Foreign Relations

"First and foremost, this so-called pivot has been about creative diplomacy:Like signing a little-noted treaty of amity and cooperation with ASEAN that opened the door to permanent representation and ultimately elevated a forum for engaging on high-stakes issues like the South China Sea. We've encouraged India's "Look East" policy as a way to weave another big democracy into the fabric of the Asia Pacific. We've used trade negotiations over the Trans-Pacific Partnership to find common ground with a former adversary in Vietnam. And the list goes on." [State Department, 1/1/13]

2. January 18, 2013: Remarks With Japanese Foreign Minister Fumio Kishida

"We also discussed the Trans-Pacific Partnership and we shared perspectives on Japan's possible participation, because we think this holds out great economic opportunities to all participating nations." [State Department, 1/18/13]

3. November 29, 2012: Remarks at the Foreign Policy Group's "Transformational Trends 2013 Forum"

"...let me offer five big-ticket agenda items that we absolutely have to get right as well. This starts with following through on what is often called our pivot to the Asia Pacific, the most dynamic region in our rapidly changing world. Much of the attention so far has been on America's increasing military engagement. But it's important that we also emphasize the other elements of our strategy. In a speech in Singapore last week, I laid out America's expanding economic leadership in the region, from new trade agreements like the Trans-Pacific Partnership to stepped-up efforts on behalf of American businesses."

"...We are welcoming more of our neighbors, including Canada and Mexico, into the Trans-Pacific Partnership process. And we think it's imperative that we continue to build an economic relationship that covers the entire hemisphere for the future." [State Department, 11/29/12]

4. November 17, 2012: Delivering on the Promise of Economic Statecraft

"And with Singapore and a growing list of other countries on both sides of the Pacific, we are making progress toward finalizing a far-reaching new trade agreement called the Trans-Pacific Partnership. The so-called TPP will lower barriers, raise standards, and drive long-term growth across the region. It will cover 40 percent of the world's total trade and establish strong protections for workers and the environment. Better jobs with higher wages and safer working conditions, including for women, migrant workers and others too often in the past excluded from the formal economy will help build Asia's middle class and rebalance the global economy. Canada and Mexico have already joined the original TPP partners. We continue to consult with Japan. And we are offering to assist with capacity building, so that every country in ASEAN can eventually join. We welcome the interest of any nation willing to meet 21st century standards as embodied in the TPP, including China." [State Department, 11/17/12]

5. November 15, 2012: Remarks at Techport Australia

"...we need to keep upping our game both bilaterally and with partners across the region through agreements like the Trans-Pacific Partnership or TPP. Australia is a critical partner. This TPP sets the gold standard in trade agreements to open free, transparent, fair trade, the kind of environment that has the rule of law and a level playing field. And when negotiated, this agreement will cover 40 percent of the world's total trade and build in strong protections for workers and the environment." [State Department, 11/15/12]

6. November 2012: Remarks With Australian Foreign Minister Robert Carr, Australian Defense Minister Stephen Smith, and Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta

"Our diplomats work side by side at regional organizations to address shared security challenges and hammer out new economic agreements, and we congratulate Australia upon becoming a new nonpermanent member of the Security Council. Our growing trade across the region, including our work together to finalize the Trans-Pacific Partnership, binds our countries together, increases stability, and promotes security." [State Department, 11/14/12]

7. November 2012: Remarks at the Opening of the AUSMIN Ministerial

"That means finalizing the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which will lower trade barriers, raise labor and environmental standards, and drive growth across the region. And it includes, of course, working closely together at the upcoming East Asia Summit to advance a shared agenda." [State Department, 11/14/12]

8. September 2012: Remarks at APEC CEO Summit

"That means pushing governments to support high-standard trade agreements like the Trans-Pacific Partnership, to drop harmful protectionist policies. It means playing by the rules, respecting workers, and opening doors qualified women. And most of all, it means doing what you do best: build, hire, and grow." [State Department, 9/8/12]

9. August 2012: Remarks With New Zealand Prime Minister Key

PRIME MINISTER KEY: "Secretary Clinton and I discussed the broad range of issues in the Asia Pacific region as we look towards the APEC summit in Russia in around 10 days time. New Zealand warmly supports the United States rebalancing towards the Asia-Pacific and we welcome the opportunities to cooperate further. In that context, we discussed our ongoing efforts to negotiate, alongside a number of other countries, a Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement."

...

SECRETARY CLINTON: "I'm also very committed to expanding investment and trade in the region, in pursuit of sustainable economic growth. Later today, I'll meet with local pearl vendors from here in the Cook Islands who are running their businesses while also protecting marine resources." [State Department, 8/31/12]

10. July 2012: Remarks to the Lower Mekong Initiative Women's Gender Equality and Empowerment Dialogue

"We've also made workers rights a centerpiece of a new far-reaching trade agreement called the Trans-Pacific Partnership. We are working with Vietnam, Malaysia, Australia, Canada, Mexico, and others in these negotiations." [State Department, 7/13/12]

11. July 2012: Remarks With Foreign Minister Pham Binh Minh After Their Meeting

"So we're working on expanding it through a far-reaching, new regional trade agreement called the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which would lower trade barriers while raising standards on everything from labor conditions to environmental protection to intellectual property. Both of our countries will benefit. And in fact, economists expect that Vietnam would be among the countries under the Trans-Pacific Partnership to benefit the most. And we hope to finalize this agreement by the end of the year." [State Department, 7/10/12]

12. July 2012: Remarks at American Chamber of Commerce Reception and Commercial Signings

"Domestic and international businesses alike continue to face rules that restrict their activities, and that, in turn, deters investment and slows growth. So we are encouraging the Government of Vietnam to keep on the path of economic and administrative reform to open its markets to greater private investment. And through the Trans-Pacific Partnership, we're working with Vietnam and seven other nations to lower trade barriers throughout the region, as we ensure the highest standards for labor, environmental, and intellectual property protections. Vietnam was an early entrant to the TPP, and we're hoping we can finalize the agreement this year. And the economic analysis is that of all the countries that will be participating -- Australia, Canada, Mexico, others -- of all the countries participating in the TPP, Vietnam stands to benefit the most. So we're hoping to really see this agreement finalized and then watch it take off." [State Department, 7/10/12]

13. July 2012: Remarks With Foreign Minister Koichiro Gemba

"We also discussed the opportunity to strengthen our economic relationship, and the United States welcomes Japan's interest in the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which we think will connect economies throughout the region, making trade and investment easier, spurring exports, creating jobs. The TPP is just one element of our increased focus on the Asia Pacific, but it is important that we recognize that the Japanese-American relationship is really at the cornerstone of everything we are doing in the Asia Pacific. We are not only treaty allies; we are friends and partners with common interests and shared values." [State Department, 7/8/12]

14. April 2012: Remarks With Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta, Philippines Foreign Secretary Albert del Rosario, and Philippines Defense Secretary Voltaire Gazmin After Their Meeting

"Finally, we discussed the maturing economic relationship between our countries as well as our shared commitment to enhanced development, trade, and investment. We would like to see the Philippines join the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade community. The foreign secretary raised the Philippines' interest in seeking passage of the Save our Industries Act, and we have conveyed that message to the United States Congress."[State Department, 4/30/12]

15. April 2012: Remarks at the White House Conference on Connecting the Americas

"Now President Obama and I have said many times that this will be America's Pacific century, and we are focused on the broader Pacific. But remember, the Pacific runs from the Indian Ocean to the western shores of Latin America. We see this as one large area for our strategic focus. That's why we're working with APEC; that's why we're creating the Trans-Pacific Partnership. We recognize the mutual benefits of engagement between the Americas and the rest of the Pacific." [State Department, 4/12/12]

16. April 2012: Forrestal Lecture at the Naval Academy

"As part of that same trip last November, the President built momentum for a new far-reaching trade agreement called the Trans-Pacific Partnership that we are negotiating with eight other countries in the Asia-Pacific region. This agreement is not just about eliminating barriers to trade, although that is crucial for boosting U.S. exports and creating jobs here at home. It's also about agreeing on the rules of the road for an integrated Pacific economy that is open, free, transparent, and fair. It will put in place strong protections for workers, the environment, intellectual property, and innovation -- all key American values. And it will cover emerging issues such as the connectivity of regional supply chains, the competitive impact of state-owned enterprises, and create trade opportunities for more small-and-medium-sized businesses." [State Department, 4/10/12]

17. April 2012: Keynote Address At Global Business Conference

"Big or small, we're standing up for an economic system that benefits everyone, like when our Embassy in Manila worked with Filipino authorities on new intellectual property protections or when our negotiators ensure that the new Trans-Pacific Partnership requires that state-owned enterprises compete under the same rules as private companies." [State Department, 2/21/12]

18. February 2012: Remarks With Singaporean Foreign Minister and Minister for Law K. Shanmugam

"This is a very consequential relationship. The multidimensional growth of our relationship with Singapore is an example of the importance that the United States sets on strengthening our engagement in the Asia Pacific. We are working together on a full range of issues, including moving forward on a high-quality trade agreement through the Trans-Pacific Partnership process." [State Department, 2/1/12]

19. December 2011: Remarks With Japanese Foreign Minister Koichiro Gemba After Their Meeting

"The minister and I also discussed a number of bilateral and regional issues and reviewed the close and ongoing collaboration between Japan and the United States in the aftermath of last March's earthquake, tsunami, and nuclear crisis. We discussed Japan's recent move to pursue consultations on joining the Trans-Pacific Partnership negotiations to resolve longstanding trade concerns in order to deepen the economic ties to the benefit of both our countries. I also urged that Japan take decisive steps so that it accedes to The Hague Convention on International Parental Child Abduction and address outstanding cases."[State Department, 12/19/11]

20. November 2011: Remarks at ASEAN Business and Investment Summit

"Now let me describe briefly four ways that we want to work with you: first, by lowering trade barriers; second, by strengthening the investment climate; third, by pursuing commercial diplomacy; and fourth, by supporting entrepreneurs. We're excited about the innovative trade agreement called the Trans-Pacific Partnership, or TPP. That would bring economies from across the Pacific, developed and developing alike, into a single trading community, not only to create more growth, but better growth." [State Department, 11/18/11]

21. November 2011: Presentation of the Order of Lakandula, Signing of the Partnership for Growth And Joint Press Availability With Philippines Foreign Secretary Albert Del Rosario

"Together we hope to deliver an array of benefits to the people, including more foreign investment to create new jobs, a more streamlined court system that can deliver justice and protect local businesses, better services, and more resources to fight poverty. Over time, these steps will better position the Philippines to join the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which we hope will dramatically increase trade and investment among the peoples of the Pacific." [State Department, 11/16/11]

22. November 2011: America's Pacific Century

"There is new momentum in our trade agenda with the recent passage of the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement and our ongoing work on a binding, high-quality Trans-Pacific Partnership, the so-called TPP. The TPP will bring together economies from across the Pacific, developed and developing alike, into a single 21st century trading community. A rules-based order will also be critical to meeting APEC's goal of eventually creating a free trade area of the Asia Pacific." [State Department, 11/10/11]

23. October 2011: Economic Statecraft

"One of America's great successes of the past century was to build a strong network of relationships and institutions across the Atlantic -- an investment that continues to pay off today. One of our great projects in this century will be to do the same across the Pacific. Our Free Trade Agreement with South Korea, our commitment to the Trans-Pacific Partnership, are clear demonstrations that we are not only a resident military and diplomatic power in Asia, we are a resident economic power and we are there to stay." [State Department, 10/14/11]

24. September 2011: Celebrating 60 years of the U.S.-Australia Alliance

"We are working to encourage trade through the Trans-Pacific Partnership and through APEC, whose leaders the President will be hosting this fall in Hawaii. Together, we are strengthening regional institutions like the East Asia Summit and ASEAN. And as Secretary Panetta will explain, our military relationship is deepening and becoming even more consequential."[State Department, 9/15/11]

25. July 2011: Remarks on Principles for Prosperity in the Asia-Pacific

"That is the spirit behind the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the so-called TPP, which we hope to outline by the time of APEC in November, because this agreement will bring together economies from across the Pacific—developed and developing alike—into a single trading community." [State Department, 7/25/11]

26. July 2011: Remarks on India and the United States: A Vision for the 21st Century

"The United States is pushing forward on comprehensive trade deals like the Trans-Pacific Partnership and our free trade agreement with South Korea. We are also stepping up our commercial diplomacy and pursuing a robust economic agenda at APEC. India, for its part, has concluded or will soon conclude new bilateral economic partnerships with Singapore, Malaysia, Japan, South Korea, and others. The more our countries trade and invest with each other and with other partners, the more central the Asia Pacific region becomes to global commerce and prosperity, and the more interest we both have in maintaining stability and security. As the stakes grow higher, we should use our shared commitment to make sure that we have maritime security and freedom of navigation. We need to combat piracy together. We have immediate tasks that we must get about determining." [State Department, 7/20/11]

27. May 2011: Secretary Clinton's Remarks With New Zealand Foreign Minister Murray McCully

"We looked ahead to the East Asia summit where President Obama will participate for the first time, and the United States will send our largest, most senior delegation ever to the Pacific Island Forum in New Zealand later this year. We talked about developments in Fiji, and both New Zealand and the United States agree that the military junta must take steps to return Fiji to democracy. And we agree on the importance of pursuing negotiations on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which will provide a free trade agreement for nine countries across the region, including both of ours. We're making steady progress on this. We hope to be able to have the negotiations complete by the time we all meet in Hawaii for APEC toward the end of this year." [State Department, 5/17/11]

28. May 2011: Remarks With Australian Foreign Minister Kevin Rudd After Their Meeting

"And both of us understand the benefits of deeper economic integration and fair trade. Minister Rudd was very influential in helping us to work toward a greater, more relevant involvement in the Pacific-Asian institutions, such as joining the East Asian Summit. The Trans-Pacific Partnership, which is exploring ways to expand opportunity, is critical, and APEC and ASEAN are two other organizations where we work together." [State Department, 5/2/11]

29. April 2011: Remarks at the American Chamber of Commerce Breakfast

"We will be hosting the 2011 APEC summit in Hawaii later this year. We are pushing to advance economic integration, remove trade barriers, and make sure that our national regulations line up in a way that encourages trade. We are also working hard on the trans-Pacific partnership, a cutting edge regional free trade agreement that would eventually cover an area responsible for over 40 percent of global trade."[State Department, 4/17/11]

30. March 2011: Remarks at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) on Latin America

"As countries step up on the global stage, they will make essential contributions to helping all of us meet some of those most important challenges. Mexico, for example, made a crucial contribution to the fight against climate change through its remarkable leadership in Cancun last year. Brazil, Mexico, and Argentina in the G-20; Chile and Mexico in the OECD; Chile and Peru in the Trans-Pacific Partnership; and along with Mexico in APEC, these are all helping to build a foundation for balanced global growth, a transparent global economy, and broad-based opportunity. "[State Department, 3/18/11]

31. March 2011: Remarks at the First Senior Officials Meeting (SOM) for the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) Forum

"The United States is also making important progress on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which will bring together nine APEC economies in a cutting-edge, next generation trade deal, one that aims to eliminate all trade tariffs by 2015 while improving supply change, saving energy, enhancing business practices both through information technology and green technologies. To date, the TPP includes Brunei, Chile, New Zealand, Singapore, Australia, Malaysia, Peru, Vietnam and the United States." [State Department, 3/9/11]

32. January 2011: Inaugural Richard C. Holbrooke Lecture on a Broad Vision of U.S.-China Relations in the 21st Century

"We are taking steps to ensure that our defense posture reflects the complex and evolving strategic environment in the region and we are working to ratify a free trade agreement with South Korea and pursuing a regional agreement through the Trans-Pacific Partnership to help create new opportunities for American companies and support new jobs here at home. Those goals will be front and center when we host the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum in Hawaii later this year." [State Department, 1/14/11]

33: November 2010: Remarks at U.S. Trade Promotion Event

"Now, we've seen how bilateral trade benefits both sides. Our challenge now is to broaden those benefits. That means we have to look for even more opportunities to increase trade and investment between us. And it means that we work harder to broaden the benefits of trade even beyond our two countries. Australia is an important partner in negotiating the ambitious new multilateral trade deal called the Trans Pacific Partnership. Over time, we hope to deliver a groundbreaking agreement that connects countries as diverse as Peru and Vietnam with America and Australia to create a new free trade zone that can galvanize commerce, competition, and growth across the entire Pacific region." [State Department, 11/7/10]

34. November 2010: Speech and Townterview with Australian Broadcasting Company

"To continue this progress, we are both pressing ahead on something called the Trans-Pacific Partnership. It's an ambitious multilateral free trade agreement that would bring together many more nations of the Pacific Rim. Australia and the United States are helping to lead those negotiations and we're also working through APEC, which the United States will host in Hawaii in 2011. We see that as a pivotal year to drive progress on internal economic changes that will open more markets and make sure that any growth is more sustainable and inclusive. And finally, we believe that the United States and Australia have been at the forefront of organize the entire region for the future." [State Department, 11/7/10]

35. November 2010: Christchurch Trade Reception Hosted by the American Chamber of Commerce

"We are looking for ways to broaden and deepen our economic ties and build on the strong foundation we already have. And we think that the Trans-Pacific Partnership is a very exciting opportunity. This multilateral free trade agreement would bring together nine countries located in the Asia Pacific region -- New Zealand and the United States, Australia, Chile, Singapore, Brunei, Peru, Vietnam, and Malaysia. By eliminating most tariffs and other trade barriers, and embracing productive policies on competition, intellectual property, and government procurement, we can spur greater trade and integration not only among the participating countries, but as a spur to the entire region.

[State Department, 11/5/10]

36. November 2010: Remarks With New Zealand Prime Minister John Phillip Key and New Zealand Foreign Minister Murray Stuart McCully

" Well, let me say that we discussed at some length, both the foreign minister and I and then the prime minister and I, the way forward on trade. We are very committed to the Trans-Pacific Partnership, and New Zealand, again, is playing a leading role. And we want to expedite the negotiations as much as possible. So we are exploring ways that we can try to drive this agenda. I am absolutely convinced that opening up markets in Asia amongst all of us and doing so in a way that creates win-win situations so that people feel that trade is in their interests." [State Department, 11/4/10]

37. November 2010: Remarks at the Pratt & Whitney Trade Event

"That is why the United States is very pleased by Malaysia's decision to join the negotiations for the Trans Pacific Strategic Economic Partnership. This regional trade agreement will promote shared success by expanding markets and building a level playing field for workers in every country that participates." [State Department, 11/3/10]

38. November 2010: Remarks with Malaysian Foreign Minister Anifah Aman

"Finally, we are pleased that Malaysia joined last month's negotiations for the Trans-Pacific Partnership. That is a pact that would expand markets and create a level playing field for people in every country that does participate. I know there are tough issues to work out, as there always are with these agreements, but Malaysia's leadership in this region for greater economic growth is absolutely essential." [State Department, 11/2/10]

39. November 2010: Secretary Clinton's Meeting with Kuala Lumpur Embassy Staff and Their Families

"And I think we have tremendous opportunities here. But I know when I leave tomorrow, the work to make those opportunities into realities falls to all of you. So I know a lot is expected of you, but we're going to be doing even more in Malaysia. We have a lot of plans for educational exchanges. We have some very exciting work on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, enhancing trade and investment (inaudible) that will promote closer cooperation." [State, Department, 11/2/10]

40. November 2010: Townterview Hosted by Media Prima in Malaysia

"So in our meetings with your government officials and even in my conversation with the prime minister earlier today, we of course talked about our bilateral relationship but we also talked about the role that Malaysia is playing in the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a new free trade agreement that will enhance market access, but also working to support Afghanistan and the people there with training and medical services." [State Department, 11/2/10]

41. October 2010:Remarks With Vietnamese Foreign Minister Pham Gia Khiem

"I n trade, our two countries have already made great progress. Fifteen years ago, our bilateral trade was about $450 million. Last year it was more than $15 billion. And the foreign minister and the prime minister and I talked about how to expand this trade relationship, including through the Trans-Pacific Partnership. The United States, Vietnam, and seven other countries finished a third round of negotiations on the TPP this month and we hope that Vietnam can conclude it in internal process and announce its status as a full member of the partnership soon." [State Department, 10/30/10]

42. October 2010: America's Engagement in the Asia-Pacific

"We are also pressing ahead with negotiations for the Trans-Pacific Partnership, an innovative, ambitious multilateral free trade agreement that would bring together nine Pacific Rim countries, including four new free trade partners for the United States, and potentially others in the future. 2011 will be a pivotal year for this agenda. Starting with the Korea Free Trade Agreement, continuing with the negotiation of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, working together for financial rebalancing at the G-20, and culminating at the APEC Leaders Summit in Hawaii, we have a historic chance to create broad, sustained, and balanced growth across the Asia Pacific and we intend to seize that. [State Department, 10/28/10]

43. September 2010: Remarks on United States Foreign Policy

"On the economic front, we've expanded our relationship with APEC, which includes four of America's top trading partners and receives 60 percent of our exports. We want to realize the benefits from greater economic integration. In order to do that, we have to be willing to play. To this end, we are working to ratify a free trade agreement with South Korea, we're pursuing a regional agreement with the nations of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, and we know that that will help create new jobs and opportunities here at home." [State Department, 9/8/10]

44. July 2010: Remarks With Vietnam Deputy Prime Minister And Foreign Minister Pham Gia Khiem

"And I am very much supportive of Vietnam's participation as a full member in the Trans-Pacific Partnership. As Vietnam embarks on labor and other reforms, the American businesses that are investing in Vietnam can provide expertise that will aid Vietnam's economic and infrastructure development."[State Department, 7/22/10]

45. January 2010: Remarks on Regional Architecture in Asia: Principles and Priorities

"In addition, the United States is engaging in the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade negotiations as a mechanism for improving linkages among many of the major Asia-Pacific economies. And to build on political progress, we must support efforts to protect human rights and promote open societies." [State Department, 1/12/10]

How Hillary Clinton Gets Around Answering Questions About Fast-Track // The National Journal // Em ma Roller – June 15, 2015

At her official campaign kickoff rally on Saturday, Hillary Clinton continued to brand herself as an economic populist while also being the most likely to beat a Republican in the general election.

But Clinton has had a tough time mapping out the specifics of that populism, particularly in relation to the Trans-Pacific Partnership. At a news conference after an event in Concord, New Hampshire on Monday, multiple reporters tried to get Clinton to come down for or against trade promotion authority (TPA), also known as "fast-track," which would make Congress pass trade agreements such as the TPP on an up-or-down vote without amendments.

With some fancy rhetorical footwork, Clinton was able to give them some fairly long-winded answers without saying much of anything. When asked if she thought the fast-track authority is appropriate, Clinton pointed out that Congress would not be passing the deal sight unseen. While the actual text of the TPP is not yet public, members of Congress and select others have access to the details.

"The TPA is a process issue. The issue for me is, what's in the deal?" Clinton said Monday. "I will wait and see what the deal is, and then I will tell you what I think about it."

That is not a very satisfying answer for more progressive members of Clinton's party. Labor unions and environmental groups bitterly oppose the trade deal and TPA, and liberal House Democrats were able to scuttle a vote Friday that would have allowed fast-track to move forward.

Clinton does not have much to lose by pleading ignorance about the details of the deal—which, to be fair, have not been finalized. If she were to come out against fast-track, as her Democratic opponents Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley have, she risks alienating more moderate Democrats and the White House while opening herself up to yet another line of attack from Republicans.

Another reporter asked Clinton if she believes the president should have fast-track authority. And, like any seasoned politician, Clinton successfully answered a yes-or-no question with an extended nonanswer, with some tautological rhetoric mixed in.

"If [Obama] wants to get fast-track authority, then he's going to have to try to figure out how to use the vote on Friday, to get some changes, to get fast track authority," Clinton said. "There's always room to maneuver, and I think this is one of those times."

The only problem is, if the White House had its druthers, the public would not be able to see the details of the deal until Congress had made it far easier to pass through without opposition. So under that timeline, Clinton weighing in on the details would be a foregone conclusion.

O'Malley—who has said he opposed the White House's fast-track authority—quickly set to work responding to Clinton's answers.

"For the thousands of American workers whose jobs are on the line with TPP, fast-track is not a 'process' issue, it's a straightforward vote on their future and their livelihood," Lis Smith, O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, said in a statement. "Governor O'Malley believes we must stop the fast-track vote in Congress now because TPP will be a bad deal for America's middle class. Now is a time for leadership, not political dodges."

Until Congressional Democrats reckon with the White House—which could happen as soon as this week—Clinton will have to continue walking the tightrope of vaguely criticizing the trade deal process and siding with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi while not upsetting the White House too much. And until then, Sanders and O'Malley will have some free political leverage of their own.

If Hillary Clinton wants to fix income inequality, here's how to do it // Yahoo News // Rick Newman – June 15, 2015

She has identified the right problem. The question is whether she'll be any better at solving it than, say, President Obama, who has tried and struggled.

Hillary Clinton has begun to articulate the issues she'll campaign on as she aims for the White House, focusing above all on the patchy prosperity that has left some Americans richer than ever while millions of others fall behind. "Prosperity can't be just for CEOs and hedge fund managers," she said during a recent speech her campaign managers characterized as a sort of coming-out party for the Democratic candidate. "The middle class needs more growth and more fairness."

While leaving specific proposals till later, Clinton vowed to boost middle-class incomes and reduce income inequality, which has been worsening for roughly 35 years. Expect that to be a familiar theme among all the 2016 presidential candidates, from Jeb Bush to Bernie Sanders, since Americans continue to say economic issues such as unemployment and stagnant wages are the nation's biggest problem. The growing gap between rich and poor obviously isn't new. But it now seems apparent that much of the middle class remains worse off than before the recession that began in 2007. That could become a decade-long decline in middle-class living standards by the time the next president takes office -- an unprecedented economic slump.

There are many ideas for how to reduce income inequality, and while none is exactly proven, there is a form of consensus on measures likely to be most effective. They include:

* Education and training programs that help people develop the skills most needed by employers.

* Tax reform that would lower rates on businesses, close loopholes and make the tax system leaner and more efficient.

* Public-private infrastructure programs that would invest more in roads and bridges while leveraging private-sector know-how to prioritize projects and assure they run efficiently.

* Better access to education, especially for underprivileged kids, including programs to make college more affordable.

* Streamlined regulations for businesses and especially for startups, which would make it easier for companies to expand, hire and thrive.

* Trade deals that open more foreign markets to U.S. products and services while protecting Americans who might be harmed if jobs move overseas.

Other ideas are more partisan, which could bedevil Clinton just as it has Obama, since whoever wins the White House in 2016 will probably have to work with a Republican-controlled House and possibly Senate. Liberal Democrats, for instance, want to raise taxes on the wealthy and transfer more money to those who might be struggling. Conservatives, by contrast, want to slash regulation, cut taxes and encourage the wealthy to spend more. For any president who wants to tackle income inequality, coming up with political compromises that include ideas appealing to both parties is at least as important as crafting an economic strategy, maybe more.

Obama has been vowing to combat income inequality for much of his time in office, with little to show for it. The economy has improved significantly since bottoming out in 2009, but it's been the slowest recovery since World War II. The Federal Reserve, which the White House doesn't control, has done more to stimulate the economy than any policy passed by Congress or driven by the White House. Obama has a detailed plan he calls "middle class economics" that would cut regulatory red tape, boost manufacturing, provide work retraining, improve access to education and do many other things to reduce the wealth gap. But Congress won't approve any of it and has even shot down bills to promote free trade, traditionally a Republican, not a Democratic, priority.

If Clinton basically adopts the Obama agenda, there's no reason to think she'll have any more success reducing income inequality than Obama has had. Instead, she might want to start by finding ways to give Republicans some of what they want, in order to get some of what she wants. If she doesn't, income inequality may continue to get worse, no matter how many speeches she gives on it.

Clinton urges tax cuts to help families pay for child care // Reuters – June 15, 2015

Democratic U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Monday called for a tax cut to help middle-class parents cope with rising child care costs and said she wanted to boost services for low-income families with young children.

"We shouldn't think of child care as just a place to deposit our children, a warehouse," Clinton said during a campaign event in Rochester, New Hampshire.

Clinton, the former first lady, U.S. senator and secretary of state, is seeking the Democratic nomination for president in the November 2016 elections, her second bid for the party nod.

This time, much of her campaign has focused on promoting liberal policies aimed at helping low-income and middle-class families, children and working women.

On Monday, Clinton said she wanted to expand Early Head Start, a federally funded program that provides education and health services to low-income families with young children.

Clinton will press for states and communities to guarantee in the next 10 years that every American 4-year-old can attend a high-quality preschool, and she will roll out other proposals related to children in the coming months, an official with her presidential campaign said in a statement.

Clinton, in NH, calls for universal preschool, chides GOP // Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – June 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton called for universal preschool Monday while accusing Republicans of "missing the boat" on the importance of early childhood education.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton made her remarks at a forum at the Rochester YMCA, the first of three events in New Hampshire as she seeks to shift her Democratic presidential campaign into a higher gear.

Clinton, answering a question on funding for education, criticized Republicans.

"Republican leaders aren't just missing the boat on early childhood education they are trying to sink it," she said. "In their budget proposal they cut funding for Head Start. Did they cut subsidies oil companies? No. Did they go after carried interest for those running hedge funds? No. The leaders took care of those at the top and went after the kids."

Clinton's remarks were are being provided by a press pool of the event.

She is scheduled to speak before a larger rally at Carter Orchard in Concord during the early afternoon.

This is Clinton's first visit to New Hampshire since her relaunch speech Saturday in New York City.

Three others are running for the Democratic Party's nomination: Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee.

As Clinton's day began, her campaign was dealing with a controversy from a national print pool reporter being barred access to the candidate's first event at the Rochester YMCA. David Martosko, who is the U.S. political editor for the Daily Mail of London, said he was denied access.

Clinton's front-runner status remains apparent from statements issued Monday from her Democratic opponents. Matt Sheaff, New Hampshire deputy state director for O'Malley, called O'Malley the "only candidate in this race who has 15 years of executive experience expanding access to pre-K education."

Hillary Clinton Offers Obama-Like Vision for America // NBC News // Perry Bacon Jr. – June 15, 2015

In her first major campaign speech Saturday, Hillary Clinton promised essentially a more aggressive and liberal version of Barack Obama's presidency, listing a series of challenges such as the huge wealth gap between the rich and the rest of America that the president has tried to address but even many Democrats say Obama has not fully solved.

Clinton's husband famously declared in 1996 that "the era of big government is over." But the former secretary of state and First Lady argued in her campaign "kickoff speech" that the wealthy and the powerful are increasingly capturing the gains of the U.S. economy and that a more forceful role for the government is needed to help middle-class and poor Americans.

While not explaining how she would fund these programs, Clinton urged the creation of millions of clean-energy jobs, paid sick and family leave for all workers and pre-school for all American children.

Clinton said she would push to make sure women get paid as much as men and reform the nation's immigration laws to create a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

Obama has proposed versions of all of those ideas.

But Clinton went further left than the president on some issues, calling for automatically registering all Americans to vote when they hit age 18 and a constitutional amendment to limit how much wealthy individuals and corporations can be spend on political campaigns.

"The middle class needs more growth and more fairness, for a lasting prosperity," Clinton said.

Her speech illustrated the sharp changes in politics since Obama's election in 2008. Obama rose to the presidency with a huge focus on foreign affairs, namely getting U.S. troops out of Iraq and Afghanistan. And the president suggested he would unify Washington and end the bickering between the two parties.

Clinton's speech had only a few sentences on national security, even though she served as Secretary of State from 2009-2013. This may reflect the challenges Obama and his team have faced in trying to wind down the U.S. military presence abroad while also preventing civil wars and the rise of groups like ISIS in the Middle East.

Clinton made a few nods to working with Republicans, but much of her language was a blistering attack on the GOP. Clinton suggested Republicans are obsessed with cutting taxes on the rich, ready to deport undocumented immigrants and intolerant toward gay, lesbian and transgender Americans.

"They shame and blame women rather than respect our right to make our own reproductive health decisions,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said in her remarks.

At another point in the speech, Clinton argued Republicans, "turn their backs on gay people who love each other."

In another shift from the start of her husband and Obama's presidencies, Clinton was very populist in tone, reflecting a Democratic Party that in 2015 increasingly views Wall Street and the financial sector as directly pitted against everyday Americans. She specifically named nurses and veterans as the kind of people who she is looking to help.

"While many of you are working multiple jobs to make ends meet, you see the top 25 hedge fund managers making more than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined. And, often paying a lower tax rate," Clinton said.

She added, "Prosperity can't just be for CEO's and hedge managers," Clinton said. "Democracy can't just be for billionaires and corporations."

And Clinton, dogged for months over the millions she and her husband have made by giving speeches to financial institutions, said "reining in the banks" was one of her major goals.

Clinton's speech was akin to a State of the Union address by a sitting president at times, as she covered a wide range of different policy issues without going into great detail on any. It at times closely paralled the State of the Union Obama gave in January, in part because Clinton and the presidency share many of the same policy ideas.

The kickoff speech, delivered in New York, will do little to alter the direction of the 2016 race. Clinton, who had been expected to run for years before, formally announced her candidacy in April and is the overwhelming favorite to win the Democratic nomination.

And many of the ideas Clinton articulated are familiar to Republicans, since President Obama has proposed many of them.

But Clinton's focus on gay rights, voting rights and women's pay pose challenges for the GOP. Obama won in 2008 and 2012 in part because young, minority and female voters heavily favored him.

Clinton' speech illustrated that she will appeal strongly to those same voting blocs. Republicans will have to figure out both issues and political appeals that can blunt her advantages among these voters.

Ex-Obama Advisor: In the Game of Dynasties, House Clinton Will Always Crush House Bush // Mediaite // Josh Feldman – June 15, 2015

The excitement for a potential matchup between Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush is... well, virtually non-existent. If 2016 ends up being Clinton v. Bush again, many voters will likely grow fatigued and roll their eyes.

But in the game of dynasties, who will reign supreme and be deemed fit to rule King's Land––er, the United States?

Well, following Bush's announcement today, former Obama advisor Dan Pfeiffer talked about which candidates would have the best chance against Clinton, like Marco Rubio and Scott Walker.

As for a Clinton-Bush match-up, "I think Jeb Bush would be one of the worst nominees Republicans could have because if you're having a battle of dynasties, the Clinton dynasty's gonna beat the Bush dynasty every time."

Or they burn the country to the ground and Donald Trump becomes king of the ashes.

Sunday Spin from Clinton Surrogates // FactCheck.org // D'Angelo Gore & Eugene Kiely – June 15, 2015

Two of Hillary Clinton's high-profile surrogates made false and misleading claims on the Sunday talk shows the day after she officially kicked off her campaign:

Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook said that "no poll shows that voters don't trust Hillary Clinton." That's false. At least two recent polls, one conducted by CNN and one jointly by the Washington Post and ABC News, found that a majority did not find Clinton to be "honest and trustworthy."

Bill Clinton claimed "we didn't have a commerce secretary" for "much of the time" his wife was secretary of state, so she did economic diplomacy work that nobody was doing. In fact, for most of her time in office — 36 of 48 months — there was a Senate-confirmed commerce secretary on the job.

Trust in Clinton

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On CBS' "Face the Nation," Mook flat-out rejected host John Dickerson's claim that "polls have shown" that "voters do not trust" Hillary Clinton.

Dickerson, June 14: Here's the question that — when I talk to Democratic strategists, people who even are anxious for her to be president. They say she can list a lot of things. The biggest problem for her is trust. The voters in the polls have shown this. Voters do not trust her. How does she overcome that?

Mook: Well, first of all, there — no poll shows that voters don't trust Hillary Clinton.

Dickerson: They don't find her honest and trustworthy.

Mook: Well, no poll says that.

But Mook is wrong.

A Washington Post/ABC News national poll published on June 3 found that 52 percent of all adults, and 56 percent of registered voters, answered "no" when asked if Clinton was "honest and trustworthy." Just 41 percent of all adults, and 38 percent of registered voters, said that she was. The poll had a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points.

Langer Research Associates, which produced the poll, noted that Clinton's ratings for honesty and trust had declined significantly since about this time last year.

Langer Research Associates, June 2: Perhaps most alarmingly for her campaign, the number who see Clinton as honest and trustworthy has dropped from 53 percent a year ago, then 46 percent two months ago, to 41 percent now. Fifty-two percent now don't see her as honest and trustworthy, the most, again, since April 2008.

A CNN-ORC International survey from late May produced similar results.
In that poll, 57 percent of those asked said that "honest and trustworthy" are not characteristics that apply to Clinton. And only 42 percent said they did apply to her. The poll had a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

The percentage who didn't find Clinton "honest and trustworthy" was up 8 percentage points from March of this year and up 14 points since March 2014.

Mook argued that "the central question in this race is whether voters can trust Hillary Clinton to be a tenacious fighter for them, to go to bat for them, to push back on the stacked deck that has kept the middle class behind."

"And the answer to that is overwhelmingly yes," he said.

Neither poll asked the question that Mook posed. However, they did ask if Clinton "understands the problems of people like you" and "cares about people like you." We'll note that the answers were not "overwhelmingly yes."

In the Washington Post/ABC News poll, 49 percent of all adults, and 47 percent of registered voters, said that Clinton understands their problems. On the other hand, 46 percent of all adults, and 50 percent of registered voters, said that she did not.

In the CNN-ORC International poll, 52 percent of respondents said that "cares about people like you" is not a characteristic that applies to Clinton, while 47 percent felt that it did apply.

No Commerce Secretary?

On CNN's "State of the Union," Bill Clinton made his remarks about the commerce secretary and economic diplomacy when asked if any contributors to the Clinton Foundation sought favors from the State Department. He said he did not know.

Bill Clinton, June 14: But I will say this. She believed — and I did too. I did the same thing when I was president. She believed that part of the [job of the] secretary of state was to advance America's economic interests around the world and for much of the time she was secretary, for a number of complex reasons, we didn't have a commerce secretary. Now we've got Penny Pritzker and she's very vigorous and very good, I think. But we didn't have one. If she hadn't been doing this economic diplomacy work, nobody would have been doing this.

The fact is that for much of the time there was a Senate-confirmed commerce secretary during Hillary Clinton's four years in office.

Hillary Clinton headed the State Department for about 48 months, from Jan. 21, 2009, to Feb. 1, 2013. For 36 of those 48 months, Gary Locke and John Bryson served as commerce secretaries. Gary Locke served from March 26, 2009, to Aug. 1, 2011. John Bryson served from Oct. 21, 2011, until June 11, 2012, before officially resigning for health reasons on June 21, 2012. (He was involved in two car accidents June 9 after suffering a seizure.)

Before Locke took office, Otto Wolf served as acting secretary for a little more than two months, from Jan. 21, 2009, to March 26, 2009. After Locke resigned, Rebecca Blank served as the acting secretary for nearly three months, from Aug. 1, 2011, to Oct. 21, 2011. Blank also served as acting commerce secretary after Bryson took a leave of absence, and she remained as acting secretary after he resigned. In all, Wolf and Blank served in an acting capacity for about 12 of the 48 months that Hillary Clinton was in office. That's not "much of the time"; that's some of the time.

As for Clinton using her office "to advance America's economic interests around the world," as her husband put it, the State Department has long been involved in economic diplomacy.

In 2006, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice created an advisory board to make recommendations on how to "transform the Department of State." In a 2007 report, the 17-member panel — which included Carly Fiorina, who is now a Republican presidential candidate — recommended elevating economic diplomacy.

The Advisory Committee on Transformational Diplomacy, 2007: Maintaining U.S. leadership in a rapidly growing and "flattening" global economy will be one of the pre-eminent challenges for U.S. diplomacy in the 21st century. The Department of State must increase its focus on economic diplomacy, bolster its capabilities in this area, and bring a forward-looking, strategic unity to USG foreign economic and development policy.

Under Clinton, the State Department did elevate economic diplomacy. On Feb. 16, 2012, Clinton announced an initiative she called "Economic Statecraft." Among other things, the department created a new position called the under secretary for economic growth, energy, and the environment.

But the initiative, which came in her final 12 months in office, was launched while Bryson was serving as commerce secretary. In fact, Bryson addressed the first-ever State Department Global Business Conference, which was Feb. 21-22, 2012.

So Hillary Clinton was involved in economic diplomacy and even elevated it, but it's not accurate to say that the Obama administration "didn't have a commerce secretary" for "much of the time" that Clinton was at the State Department or that she did economic diplomacy alone.

Hillary Clinton, the center-left's champion // Newsday // Stephen Stromberg – June 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton ended much of the suspense about what she's running on, delivering her first full campaign-style stump speech on New York's Roosevelt Island on Saturday. The result was a platform of workmanlike liberal policy that neither mimics her husband's agenda nor fully dignifies the populists pushing the Democratic Party from the country's ideological governing space. America's center-left has a champion.

Clothed in rhetoric condemning economic and social inequality, Clinton's address acknowledged the power of the Obama coalition of young and minority voters, striking a very different note from the triangulated social conservatism of her husband's presidency. She promised to help pretty much everyone except Republican presidential candidates and hedge-fund managers, arguing that the country needs an "inclusive economy" supported by an "inclusive society."

She proposed laws barring discrimination against gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people, backed universal preschool and child care, supported a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants with clean records, demanded easier access to the polls and endorsed a constitutional amendment re-imposing restrictions on political spending.

In one of the best lines in her speech, Clinton mocked the cowardice of Republicans who dodge reporters' questions on climate change. "They'll say, 'I'm not a scientist,'" she said. "Well, then why don't they start listening to those who are?" In one of the worst lines in her speech, Clinton again punted on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, bowing to progressives' current anti-trade hysteria. "Advances in technology and the rise of global trade have created whole new areas of economic activity and opened new markets for our exports," she said, "but they have also displaced jobs and undercut wages for millions of Americans."

But, thankfully, Clinton also avoided some of the worst populist excesses of the Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party. Crucially, Clinton emphasized the importance of economic growth, innovation and efficient government, not rigid regulatory and tax policies or unaffordable expansions of entitlements. "The middle class needs more growth and more fairness," she said. "Growth and fairness go together. For lasting prosperity, you can't have one without the other."

Clinton appears to be aligning herself with Democrats who stress the importance of economic competitiveness and flexibility in enabling the country to keep up with global competition and advance the standard of living.

It remains to be seen whether Clinton can harness the energy of progressives without buying more fully into their extravagances. But for those seeking care and substance, her speech was a pretty good opening move.

Hillary and Bill Clinton: Campaign Speech Twinsies // TIME // Nell Scovell – June 15, 2015

All campaign speeches have overlap. Blah, blah, middle class… Wah-wah education… Rah-rah, opportunity for all. But comparing then Governor Clinton's kick-off campaign speech on October 3, 1991, with former Senator Hillary Clinton's kick-off campaign speech on June 13, 2015, reveals some interesting overlaps and omissions.

The Critical Missing Sentence From Hillary Clinton's Roosevelt Island Speech // Forbes // Rick Ungar – June 15, 2015

As one whose political philosophy tends to lean to the left, it should come as no surprise that there was much in Hillary Clinton’s “reintroduction” speech that I found to my liking.

But there was something missing—something that would have told me, and millions of Americans who want to support Mrs. Clinton but just aren’t yet convinced, that she understands that progressives are grown-ups who are more than capable of hearing reality and responding positively to the same.

More on that in a moment.

The speech began well for me. After all, what Democrat with an understanding of our nation’s history is not a sucker for a speech designed to follow in the legendary footsteps of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt?

By the way, if you do not have much of a historical understanding or “feel” for what FDR was all about, it wouldn’t be a terrible idea to watch the multi-part PBS special on The Roosevelts—brilliantly put together by Ken Burns—to gain some sense of how the modern Democratic Party came to be.

Doing what no presidential candidate has done in a very long time, Mrs. Clinton invoked and honored this most significant of American presidents, not only by holding her first major rally on New York’s Roosevelt Island, but by reminding one and all of the greatness of Roosevelt and what has allowed him to achieve such status in the pantheon of great American leaders, noting:

“President Roosevelt called on every American to do his or her part, and every American answered. He said there’s no mystery about what it takes to build a strong and prosperous America: ‘Equality of opportunity… Jobs for those who can work… Security for those who need it… The ending of special privilege for the few… The preservation of civil liberties for all… a wider and constantly rising standard of living.’ That still sounds good to me,” Clinton said. “It’s America’s basic bargain. If you do your part you ought to be able to get ahead. And when everybody does their part, America gets ahead too.”

Not only was Mrs. Clinton bringing context to what makes a Democrat a Democrat, she managed to channel her inner-Elizabeth Warren to the base of her party—a base that fears that Hillary Clinton is running to be “triangulator-in-chief,” meaning that she may be all too willing to make any number of deals with the devil if it gets her the presidency.

While the speech likely bolstered Hillary’s stock with the left-wing base—who will remain suspicious if temporarily mollified—Clinton miscalculated in one area and, by so doing, failed in the opportunity to reach out to the average American who describes himself or herself as socially moderate or liberal while fiscally conservative.

The fact that Mrs. Clinton provided a laundry list supporting virtually every liberal cause in the book in the effort to establish her social progressiveness was certainly to be expected. And while some of the items on her list of objectives could be accomplished at no financial cost to the nation, most of her proposals would, indeed, come with a heavy price tag.

That is a reality that will not be missed by millions of progressives, not to mention the independent and centrist Americans whose support is critical to a candidate of either party.

Mrs. Clinton would have done well to confront that elephant on the island head on.

After putting forth her wish list for a better America, Hillary would have been wise to point out that much of this will cost money—more money than the nation actually has or can expect to have in the years to come. As a result, it will be necessary to prioritize her goals in the effort to create that America where everyone willing to work has a chance for a better life.

Clinton should then have invited Americans to tell her how they would set the priorities of her administration so as to guide her along the path to succeeding in many—if not all—of her goals without breaking a bank that is already hanging by a chad.

By failing to call out this reality, Mrs. Clinton pretended that she could, somehow, succeed in bringing about all of these transformative proposals in an eight year period and that this would be doable without further digging the debt hole even larger than it already is.

Hillary Clinton has always been to Obama's left on economics // VOX // Matthew Iglesias – June 15, 2015

At a dramatic weekend rally on Roosevelt Island, Hillary Clinton unleashed a speech that was in some ways strikingly liberal, especially for a candidate who's not facing meaningful opposition in the Democratic primary. Politico's Glenn Thrush says it shows that "the Democratic Party is moving left fast" and Clinton knows it, which is why she uncorked "economic-inequality rhetoric could have been comfortably uttered by the likes of Elizabeth Warren, Joseph Stiglitz, Bernie Sanders, or Martin O'Malley."

The truth, however, is that on the kind of pocketbook issues Clinton spent most of yesterday's speech discussing, she's always been on the left wing of the Democratic Party. She's been in the public eye far too long to have avoided inconsistencies over the years. But in positional terms, somewhat to the left of Obama — or Bill Clinton — on economics is where she's been this whole time.

Clinton's voting record was to the left of Obama's

In 2008, both Clinton and Obama spent a lot of time debating a single fateful vote she cast in 2002 in favor of George W. Bush's invasion of Iraq. But if you look at all the votes that were cast during the four years they served together in the Senate, it was Clinton who amassed the more liberal record.

In the 109th Senate, Obama was the 17th most liberal member (between Chuck Schumer and Tom Harkin), while Clinton was the 13th most liberal member.

In the 110th Senate, Obama was the 18th most liberal member (again one tick to the left of Schumer) while Clinton was again 13th most liberal.
Another way of looking at it is that of the two Democratic senators from New York, Clinton was the more liberal. Of the two Democratic senators from Illinois, Obama was the more conservative.

Of course, one could say that these kind of crude vote-agglomeration methods miss a lot of what matters. A single vote on Iraq was more consequential than dozens of votes on budget amendments. But this is the point. Clinton's reputation as a centrist Democrat comes largely from her foreign policy. On the economic issues that dominate congressional votes by volume, she's liberal.

On economics, Clinton ran left in 2008

In keeping with her voting record, Clinton ran to Obama's left on economic issues in the 2008 primaries. This manifested itself most clearly on the subject of health care, where Clinton was willing to include a politically unpopular individual mandate to buy health insurance as part of a program for universal coverage. Obama was not willing to go so far, and came in for substantial criticism from liberals for it. Less famously, Clinton proposed a Cabinet-level poverty czar position — an idea that might make a comeback in 2016.

The ideological divide here was not large, but it was reflected in patterns of support for the two candidates. Clinton secured more labor union backing than Obama, and Obama did better than Clinton at gaining primary votes from self-identified independents.

Much of the primary debate ended up focusing on foreign policy, where Clinton was (and continues to be) more hawkish than Obama. But there's nothing new about her running left on economics.

Hillary led the left wing of the Clinton administration

Reaching further back in time, there is considerable evidence that Hillary was to the left of her husband on economics in the 1990s. As Peter Beinart recounts, she was the senior adviser through whom liberals generally tried to win over the White House.

Carl Bernstein reports that in 1993, Hillary opposed the decision to prioritize deficit reduction, saying, "You didn't get elected to do Wall Street economics."

Sally Bedell Smith reports that in 1995, Hillary and Robert Reich tried (and failed) to get Bill to make a big stink about CEO pay.

George Stephanopoulos, who was in a position to know, referred to Hillary as "the most powerful liberal in the White House."

A then-obscure law professor named Elizabeth Warren reached out to Hillary and helped convince her to persuade her husband to veto a bank-friendly bankruptcy bill at the very end of the Clinton administration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of this, especially the parts about Clinton being out of step with the Wall Street wing of the party, has been obscured by subsequent events. Clinton, for example, flip-flopped on the bankruptcy issue in 2005.

But one should be cautious about reading too much into a New York politician's friendliness to Wall Street — especially a politician with such tenuous ties to New York. As a senator from Illinois, Obama was an ally of the Illinois coal industry. Elizabeth Warren is a dogmatic liberal on virtually every issue, but also a loyal ally of the medical device industry, which happens to be substantially based in the Boston area. Things can change over time, but it seems likely that First Lady Hillary Clinton rather than Fake New Yorker Hillary Clinton is the better guide to her views on Wall Street.

Hillary Clinton Calls Trade Stalemate 'a Process Issue' // Bloomberg News // Ali Elkin – June 15, 2015

Campaigning in New Hampshire, Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton on Monday continued to hedge on whether President Barack Obama should have fast-track authority in the Trans-Pacific Partnership Trade Agreement—and whether she would want it if she were the president.

"I'm going to say this," she said, speaking to reporters at an orchard in Concord, N.H. "I believe that you take whatever happens to you in a negotiation and you try to leverage it. In this case, I believe that one of the ways the president could get fast-track authority is to deal with the legitimate concerns of those Democrats who are potential 'yes' voters, to see what within the negotiation or what's even in the existing framework agreement that's being drafted, could be modified or changed."

Saying the failed House vote on Friday was "a process issue," Clinton echoed her remarks on Sunday in Iowa. “The president should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with Nancy Pelosi,” she said. “And if we don't get it, there should be no deal.”

Monday's press conference followed weeks of complaints from reporters about Clinton's lack of availability, as well as a weekend of appearances by members of her staff, who also would not give an opinion on Clinton's behalf about the trade agreement. Senator Bernie Sanders and others have sharply criticized Clinton's refusal to take a position. "I am not clear, nor do I believe the American people are clear, as to what Secretary Clinton's position is," he said. "Is she for it or is she against it? Those are your two options."

After the failure of a strategic vote crucial to sending fast-track trade authority to the White House—a stunning defeat for Obama—Republicans are pushing for a new vote this week.

In New Hampshire, Clinton also touched on the criticism that her own family's wealth stands at odds with her campaign's populist message.

"I'm very grateful for the success that Bill and I have had," she said. "We both come from hardworking families and we have worked really hard, both of us, over the course of our lives and we feel blessed. We feel absolutely grateful for the opportunities that we've had. But I've been saying pretty much the same thing since I was a college student: I'm proud of my progressive credentials and experiences and accomplishments and I am waging a campaign about what I think is best for the country and it's going to be up to the American people to draw their own conclusions."

Clinton campaign bans national pool reporter from N.H. events // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – June 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential campaign this morning banned a representative from the national print pool from attending any of her events in New Hampshire, a development that will make coverage for her trip to New Hampshire spotty for some of the country’s largest print outlets.

The campaign team for Clinton, who is a former US secretary of state, is not allowing a reporter from the Daily Mail, a London news outlet, to have access to her events. Nick Merrill, a Clinton campaign spokesman, said that the campaign is getting “blowback” from foreign outlets. Foreign outlets have not been granted access to some Clinton events because the campaign wants to give preference to US publications.

“We need to rethink it all, maybe for a day,” Merrill told David Martosko, a reporter for the Daily Mail, according to the reporter’s account of the conversation sent to other outlets in the national pool. “And just cool things off until we can have a discussion.”

The flap is the latest flashpoint between the Clinton campaign and the political press corps. Clinton has only answered a handful of questions from the press, and over the weekend sat for her first interviews since she declared her candidacy in mid-April. Her near universal name recognition sets her apart from other political candidates who typically seek news coverage to promote their campaigns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, intense media interest in the Clinton campaign prompted the campaign to request that the media form a pool for coverage. In the pool, a group of roughly a dozen outlets take turns traveling to cover Clinton in small, closed events and write reports off her remarks. The dispatches are first shared by e-mail with the outlets participating in the rotation, and then sent at the end of the day to all interested news outlets.

The pool was organized by the participating media, not the Clinton campaign. Any print outlet that commits to join the traveling rotation can join. It's currently being run by reporters from Buzzfeed and Politico.

Merrill said the Daily Mail reporter was denied because the campaign is trying to follow White House conventions for pooled coverage. The Daily Mail hasn't been added to the White House's regular print pool – though the publication does have a regular White House correspondent with a so-called "hard pass" that allows her access to the West Wing.

The Boston Globe, which participates in the Clinton traveling press pool and the White House pool, has access to Clinton's events today because a reporter from the paper was selected as a member of the local pool. The Globe's circulation area includes New Hampshire. The Clinton campaign has a policy to always allow wire reporters access to pool events.

Clinton is holding three events today, and two of them are open only to pooled coverage. Those include a forum in this morning in Rochester, N.H., on early childhood education and a dinner this evening in Manchester. Clinton is set to give the keynote address at the Manchester City Democrats Flag Day Dinner.

When Martosko showed up at their first event in Rochester, he said he was denied access inside the YMCA of Strafford County by a "Secret Service agent." When he requested to use the restroom, the agent told him the area had already gone through a security sweep and he should "hit the woods."

Unlike her Democratic rivals, Clinton's campaign has only held a handful of public events since she announced her candidacy – meaning access to the smaller or pooled events are critical to understanding how she's formulating positions.

For example, on Sunday, Clinton gave a full explanation of her position on trade Sunday evening at a small house party in Burlington, Iowa. She also foreshadowed this morning's Rochester forum by saying the campaign will focus on early childhood education.

Hillary Clinton Again Avoids Taking A Position On Trade Deal // NBC News // Leigh Ann Caldwell – June 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton gave her first organized news conference on Monday since she announced her candidacy two months ago. Despite being pressed on her position on the trade deal that has divided Democrats and consumed Congress, Clinton still refused to take a position and maintained that she would "judge the final product."

"I will judge what's in the final agreement but hope it can be made better," Clinton told reporters in New Hampshire.

Like she did in Iowa over the weekend, Clinton said she thinks President Barack Obama should use the failure of the trade agreement in the House of Representatives as leverage to get more out of the deal and attract more Democrats.

"I think this is a chance to use this leverage so the deal does become one that more Americans and more members of Congress can vote for," she said.

While Clinton gave Obama such advice, she also praised him for an economic recovery and said he "doesn't get the credit he deserves."

"I think the president has done an extraordinary job dealing with a terrible set of issues," she said of the president coming into office amidst a deep recession.

The former Secretary of State also addressed the criticism that she is too wealthy to understand the needs of the middle class and those who are struggling financially. She said she's "proud of her progressive credentials," adding that she's believed in progressive ideals "since college."

"When I say I'm going to fight ... that's what I'm going to do every single day," Clinton said.

De Blasio says Hillary Clinton lacks 'vision' // Marisa Schultz and Michael Gartland – June 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even after delivering a campaign speech packed with eat-the-rich rhetoric, Hillary Clinton was still unable Sunday to win an endorsement from her far-left-leaning former protégé, Mayor Bill de Blasio.

“I’ve been waiting to hear a vision,” de Blasio said. “She’s doing more each time to give us a clearer picture, and I’m very optimistic, but we’ve got to see the plan of how she’s going to turn around this horrible income-inequality problem.”

In her Saturday campaign kickoff rally on Roosevelt Island, Clinton pledged support for gay rights, universal pre-K, paid family leave and higher wages for workers — all while vowing to keep corporate CEOs and hedge-fund managers in check.

But it wasn’t enough for de Blasio, who seeks to be a progressive kingmaker.
“It was a great speech,” he conceded, calling her “tremendously qualified.”

“I really commend her for what I thought was a powerful and progressive speech.”
Still, he said, he wants “to see those details.”

Clinton took another progressive turn Sunday by offering support for the Democrats, led by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who together defied President Obama on Friday in sinking a key trade-deal vote.

“The president should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with Nancy Pelosi, who had expressed their concerns about the impact that a weak agreement would have on our workers to make sure we get the best, strongest deal possible,” Clinton told about 600 supporters in Iowa at her first public rally. “And if we don’t get it, there should be no deal.”

Clinton had been pounded from the right and left for failing to pick a side on whether to grant Obama fast-track authority for an Asia trade deal.

Sen. Bernie Sanders, her rival for the Democratic nomination, said Sunday on CBS’s “Face the Nation” that the trade deal would be a “disaster” and that Clinton should “side with every union in the country” and oppose the measure.

Earlier Sunday, Rep. Paul Ryan called her silence on the issue “mystifying.”

“Pick a position; that’s what leaders do,” he said on “Fox News Sunday” after a Clinton spokeswoman punted the question.

Meanwhile, hubby Bill Clinton sought to build up Hillary’s trust after a poll found that more than half of Americans believe her to be dishonest.

“I trust her with my life,” he told CNN’s “State of the Union.”

And he dismissed allegations that his wife’s policies as secretary of state were influenced by foreign donors to the family’s Clinton Foundation.

“She was pretty busy those years,” Bill Clinton said. “I never saw her study a list of my contributors, and I had no idea who was doing business before the State Department.”
Also Sunday, Hillary Clinton sat for an interview with Radio Iowa in Des Moines, where she equated the attacks on her as “a strange form of respect and even flattery, because if they weren’t so concerned about me, they’d leave me alone.

“They get up every day, you know, worried that the case I’m making will break through,” she said.

Hillary Clinton Is Taking Sides in Obama's Trade Fight With Liberal Democrats // Mic // Gregory Krieg – June 15, 2015

In politics, there is a distinct difference between giving an answer to a question and actually answering the question. Reporters have for weeks been asking Hillary Clinton's campaign whether she supports giving President Barack Obama the power to unilaterally negotiate a controversial trade deal currently pitting the White House against liberal Democratic leaders in Congress. For weeks, Clinton and her team seem to have done everything in their power to avoid giving a serious answer.

On Sunday in Iowa, that changed.

Speaking to a crowd of supporters in Des Moines, then in separate interviews with the Des Moines Register and Radio Iowa, Clinton broke from Obama and urged the administration to both partner with House Democratic

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and use the opposition in her caucus as leverage to negotiate a more labor-friendly version of the pending 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership.

"I think what Nancy Pelosi said on the floor when she voted to essentially stop it is the right approach to take," Clinton told the Register.

Following an afternoon rally, Clinton went into greater detail, telling Radio Iowa that Obama should "go back to the other countries and say: 'You want a lot out of this. I need more. Our market is still the biggest, most consumer friendly in the world, but I can't go forward unless I get X, Y and Z from you.'"

"Convince people who are convincible ... that you have answered some of the legitimate questions that have been raised," she said.

Clinton was just as blunt during her live remarks, according to MSNBC, saying Obama "should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with Nancy Pelosi, who has expressed concern about the impact a trade agreement could have on our workers, to make sure we get the best deal possible.

"And if we don't get it, there should be no deal."

Why it matters: While this might seem pretty cut-and-dry, Clinton's critics continue to assert that she is vacillating. But here's the thing: Clinton is not running for a seat in Congress. If she was, it would make sense for voters and journalists to demand an immediate, real-time answer on whether she would vote to give the president "fast-track" authority. That bit of legislation, also called Trade Provisional Authority, provides the White House with the autonomy to negotiate the trade agreement and present it to Congress for a straight up-or-down vote without amendments.

But Clinton is running for president. With her comments Sunday, Clinton simply articulated what she would do if elected to the office she is campaigning to win. (Though it would be reasonable to assume, given her explicit backing of Pelosi's tactics, that she would have voted with the liberal detractors.)

If we can't accept that level of nuance, then it is the line of questioning, not Clinton's answers, that begins to seem disingenuous or cynical. There are plenty of reasons to oppose the Trans Pacific Partnership on its face. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), is a vocal opponent of free trade expansion, stating his very reasonable worries that these agreements tend to favor multinational corporations at the expense of American workers.

You might agree with Sanders. There is a lot of evidence showing that the North American Free Trade Agreement, signed by former President Bill Clinton in 1993 after being granted an extension to his "fast-track" authorities, was a disaster for the U.S. middle class. But the TPP is a new deal. Obama calls it the "most progressive trade agreement in our nation's history." Is he being truthful? The administration's decision to keep the details hidden from the public is a good reason to be skeptical.

Either way, Clinton has planted her flag. As she said later during her talk with Radio Iowa, "I'm going to set forth what I believe, what I think will work ... and then people will make their own decisions."

Top hedge fund managers make more than all kindergarten teachers combined // Politifact // Lauren Carroll – June 15, 2015

At her presidential campaign kick-off rally June 13, Hillary Clinton said the rich are getting richer, while many Americans are struggling to make ends meet. Case in point: the disparity between Wall Street hedge fund managers and kindergarten teachers.

"While many of you are working multiple jobs to make ends meet," she said, "you see the top 25 hedge fund managers making more than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined. And, often paying a lower tax rate."

Is the salary gap between kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers really so wide? We decided to check it out. (We previously looked into a Clinton claim about taxes among the working class and the ultra-wealthy.)

Kindergarten teachers

The best data we could find on kindergarten teachers comes from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Other statistical sources, such as the National Center for Education Statistics, don't separate out kindergarten teachers specifically.

According to a 2014 BLS report, there are about 158,000 kindergarten teachers in the United States. The figure includes teachers from both public and private schools, though it excludes special education instructors.

The average annual pay for a kindergarten teacher is $53,480 -- ranging from less than $34,000 to more than

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

$78,000. This is higher than what the average preschoolteacher makes, but slightly lower than that of elementary, middle and high schoolteachers.

So the aggregate pay for kindergarten teachers is about $8.5 billion.

For some historical context, Susan Moore Johnson, an education professor at Harvard University, said kindergarten teachers have traditionally been paid less than teachers at higher grade levels. But the implementation of district-wide pay scales has made pay mostly uniform across all grades within a district -- with exact salary varying based on experience and education, rather than the grade level. However, this is not the case in all districts.

Johnson added that, according to the National Center for Education Statistics, private school elementary teachers get paid, on average, several thousand dollars less than their public school counterparts.

So how does the $8.5 billion collective salary of America's kindergarten teachers compare to the top-25 hedge fund managers' take-home pay? This number is a little bit more elusive.

Hedge fund managers

In its 2015 ranking of the top-earning hedge fund managers, Institutional Investor's Alpha magazine said the group of 25 collectively earned $11.62 billion in compensation.

At the top of the list is Citadel founder and CEO Kenneth Griffin, who earned an estimated $1.3 billion off his fund.

Lest your jaw remain fully hinged, 2014 was a bad year. The magazine called the total $11.62 billion bounty "paltry" compared to what it was in 2013, when the top-25 hedge managers made about twice as much -- $21.15 billion.

There are, however, some issues with measuring hedge manager salaries, though the experts we polled couldn't name a source that would necessarily be more accurate than Alpha magazine's list.

The magazine's report is just an estimate -- based on the manager's capital gains in the fund, as well as his (the top 25 are all men) estimated share in the firm's management and performance fees charged to clients.

These numbers are hard to verify because no one really knows for certain a manager's stake in his or her firm, said Nicole Boyson, a finance professor at Northeastern University.

Additionally, funds charged to clients vary drastically among and within the different firms, and one would also have to account for how much of these fees go toward running the business, rather than the salary, Boyson said.

"If you could get comfortable with the 'right' number for a hedge fund manager, which I am not sure is possible, then you could compare it directly to the gross pay of teachers ... with the caveat that these two groups are likely subject to different tax rates, etc.," Boyson said.

In any case, the best information we have shows 25 hedge managers making about $3 billion more than the country's 158,000 kindergarten teachers combined -- and that's in a bad year for the hedge managers. The data here isn't perfect, but the gap between the two professions is so wide that it seems a safe bet that hedge fund managers make more.

Our ruling

Clinton said, "The top-25 hedge fund managers (are) making more than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined."

Bureau of Labor Statistics data shows that America's 158,000 kindergarten teachers together make $8.5 billion a year.

There are a few possible problems with the data for hedge fund managers' earnings, but there's no denying it's significantly higher than a kindergarten teacher's compensation. A rough estimate for the top-25 hedge fund managers shows they collectively earned $11.62 billion in 2014, and that was a bad year. In 2013, they earned approximately $21.15 billion. So using the smaller number, kindergarten teachers come up shy of hedge fund managers by about $3 billion, a huge margin.

We rate Clinton's claim True.

When Hillary Clinton ran for president in 2008, she said she felt like she had an "extra burden" of convincing the American people that a woman could be president and commander in chief. Now, she notes in an interview with the Des Moines Register, television is full of women in power.

The Democratic secretary of state noted two contemporary shows that feature women in power: "Veep," an HBO comedy in which Julia Louis-Dreyfus portrays a vice president who ascends to the top office when the president steps down. Then there's "Madam Secretary," a CBS show featuring Téa Leoni as U.S. Secretary of State.

"Madam Secretary" star Tea Leoni on hit series, women on TV
Years before either of those shows, Clinton was a reference point on "Gilmore Girls," a show about the life of single mother Lorelai Gilmore and her daughter, Rory, that aired for seven years on the WB and the CW networks. During the show's third season, Rory tells her boyfriend, Dean, that she plans to write her college application essay about Clinton.

"She's so smart and tough and nobody thought she could win New York but she did and she's doing amazing, and have you heard her speak?" Rory says. When Dean responds that she's made him watch "thousands" of hours of footage of Clinton on C-SPAN, Rory gushes, "She's a great speaker, strong and persuasive with a wonderful presence, and even those suits of hers are getting better." (The Hillary essay plan is derailed when a college admissions officer sitting on a panel at Rory's high school says, "If I read one more over-adulating piece of prose about Hillary Clinton and her profound influence, my head will explode.").

"A lot of different cultural references, which I find both fascinating and kind of reinforcing, because it does take a leap of faith of imagination for people to envision a woman in the Oval Office, and oftentimes culture, entertainment is ahead of the political system in lots of ways," Clinton told the Des Moines Register.

The creators of "Madam Secretary" have said that Clinton was an inspiration for fictional Secretary Elizabeth McCord, but that the character also drew on former female Secretaries of State Madeleine Albright and Condoleezza Rice.

"When we got into developing [the show], to me, the first thing I had to do was make it fictional, make a character who wasn't Hillary," writer and creator Barbara Hall told Politico when the show first hit the airwaves in the fall of 2014. She said she doesn't "mind" the discussion which compares the show to Clinton, but said, "I think it's clear in the show, that that's not what we're doing."

In fact, the show spent more time looking at Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, D-New York, who, like Leoni's character, has young children that she balances with her high-profile job.

Bill Clinton: 'You can't have people walking around with guns' // The Washington Times // Jessica Chasmar – June 15, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton on Sunday blamed the recent unrest in Baltimore on people owning too many guns in this city, combined with a lack of trust in the local police department.

Speaking on CNN's "State of the Union," Mr. Clinton first suggested that development opportunities and more jobs could be the solution in Baltimore. He cited the Baltimore-based athletic clothing company Under Armour as keeping 17,000 jobs in the city.

"I'd go get that guy from Under Armour and I would bring all these leaders and all these kids and I'd figure out what to do and come up with a strategy. You don't have to solve it all overnight, you just have to make it better than it was," he said.

"The Baltimore thing came on the heels of what happened in Ferguson, what happened in New York City and all these other places. And there is a big national movement about whether the lives of young African-American men count," Mr. Clinton said, referring to the #BlackLivesMatter movement.

"You can't have people walking around with guns. I used to tell people when we did Bosnia, Kosovo, anything like that: You get enough people with weapons around, and there will be unintended consequences. People make mistakes. People do wrong. Things happen," he continued.

"To hold a community together, you've got to have a high level of community trust. Somebody that's in your family gets shot, you want an answer from somebody you know, and you want to be able to ask questions and get them answered and resolve that. So I think that in addition to economics, we need to look at the places in America where these things happen and they don't drive people into the streets because they actually trust the process in resolving them. There's such a trust deficit in America today," Mr. Clinton said.

Clinton: I never saw Hillary 'study a list of my contributors' // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 15,

2015

Former President Bill Clinton emphatically denied that 2016 Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton gave any favors to Clinton Foundation donors during her time as secretary of State.

“She was pretty busy those years,” Clinton said during an interview aired Sunday on CNN's "State of the Union."

“I never saw her study a list of my contributors, and I had no idea who was doing business before the State Department," he added.
In the early days of Hillary Clinton’s campaign for president, the former New York senator and first lady has faced attacks about foreign government funding for her family’s charitable organization, which does humanitarian work around the world.

The organization has admitted to omitting certain donations from its publicly available records.

Clinton specifically defended one donation that has come under scrutiny, a $500,000 check from the Embassy of Algeria in 2010. The foundation has acknowledged that the donation was not properly approved under rules the Obama administration put in place after Hillary Clinton became Secretary of State.

“I can say the one thing that there’s nothing to it is the Algeria giving half a million dollars for the Haiti earthquake,” Clinton said. “That Algerian money, we didn’t report that not because we were ashamed of it, but because it was coming within two days of the earthquake and they were performing imputative surgery on the lawn outside the major hospital with a flashlight at night and vodka for anesthesia and antiseptic. Nobody thought about it.”

Clinton also promoted the “economic diplomacy” that his wife did during her time in the Obama administration, pointing out that there was not a secretary of Commerce during much of that span.

“If she hadn’t been doing this economic diplomacy work, nobody would have been doing this,” he said. “I never thought about any overlap.”

Clinton camp shuts out foreign reporter // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s campaign is not allowing a Daily Mail reporter access to campaign events despite being chosen by media outlets to provide pooled coverage of Monday’s trip around New Hampshire.

Nick Merrill, a senior Clinton campaign press aide, told David Martosko, the U.S. political editor for the Daily Mail, was shut out because of “blowback from foreign outlets that want to be a part of the pool.”

“We need to rethink it all, maybe for a day, and just cool things off until we can have a discussion,” Merrill told Martosko.

When Martosko pointed out that non-American news sites like the Guardian are part of the pool, Merrill said that those outlets were a part of the official White House press pool, so the campaign treated those outlets differently. Martosko said on Twitter that he still plans to drive to Clinton’s event in Rochester, N.H.

News outlets covering Clinton set up the pool independently so that participating outlets would not have to always have someone traveling with the campaign. One representative chosen from the rotation each day travels closely with the campaign and provides all pool members with notes from her events.

But only outlets that have pledged to help with the travel pool receive immediate updates; other media outlets do not receive an aggregate list of all the reports until the end of Clinton's trip. That includes foreign outlets that can't send reporters stateside.

"We want a happy press corps as much as the press corps does. And we work very hard to achieve that in tandem with them," Merrill told Politico in a statement.

"It's a long campaign, and we are going to do our best to find equilibrium and best accommodate interest from as many news outlets as possible, given the space limitations of our events."

EXCLUSIVE: The day Hillary’s team booted me off the bus: ‘The Clinton's campaign wants to control which reporters can come along for the ride. Today it was supposed to be me - but at the last minute I was shut out. That's NOT okay' // The Daily Mail // David Martokso – June 15, 2015

Driving through New Hampshire in the rain without knowing where you're headed is an unnerving experience, but that's where I found myself this morning after Hillary Clinton's staff said I wouldn't be allowed to do my job reporting on her campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the Clinton camp's request, a group of journalists set up a traveling 'pool' so a single print reporter can be everyone's eyes and ears at events where a room is too small to fit a crush of questions from a larger group.

Plus it saves more than a dozen news organizations the expense of having to be on the campaign trail every time Clinton decides to speak.

On Monday I was the designated 'pooler,' tasked by this informal group of my colleagues with going to two events in New Hampshire.

I landed at the Manchester, N.H. airport well after midnight, thanks to a lengthy flight delay in Washington. A message was waiting for me from one of the reporters who has the thankless task of coordinating the pool with the Clinton campaign.

There was a problem: Hillary's press staff said DailyMail.com wasn't welcome, and they decided it at the last minute.

The pool was asked to send a different reporter. It was too late to substitute someone else in the Live Free or Die state at that point, so I said I'd show up anyway.

Six hours earlier I had received emails from two different Clinton media liaisons – including the former secretary of state's traveling press secretary, Nick Merrill – telling me where to show up and when.

So what happened? That's the nagging question.

Monday morning I showed up at 7:45 in a parking lot where I was to hop on a Clinton campaign van for a drive to the town of Rochester, where the first event would be.
A very junior staffer told me I couldn't climb aboard: I wasn't 'on the list.'
No matter – I'm paid to chase stories, not to take no for an answer. I got back in my rental car and followed them to Rochester.

On the way, I spoke with Merrill for 10 minutes. He gave me a handful of reasons for the sudden rug-pulling.

At first it was because the campaign didn't want some foreign press outlets participating in the pool when others were giving them 'blowback' about being shut out of events when space is limited.

OK, so DailyMail.com is owned by the Daily Mail newspaper from England but the US content is not EDITED by that newspaper, it is edited in New York and currently has nearly 200 employees growing at about 50% a year – and more US online readers than every big city newspaper in America other than the New York Times.

The Clinton campaign hired two passenger vans to drive reporters to Rochester, NH on Monday morning but refused to let me board them, saying I wasn't approved to attend the morning event.

(The traveling press pool welcomes all credentialed outlets, whether they're from the U.S. or Antarctica. The Guardian and AFP, from the UK and France respectively, are already part of it.)

Perhaps they realized that wasn't going to fly because next they claimed the campaign was trying to follow the example of the White House pool, and by that standard we should have been excluded.

(DailyMail.com is part of what's called the 'supplemental' White House pool. Although our excellent White House correspondent, Francesca Chambers, has the same permanent credentials as her counterparts at The New York Times, the Associated Press and CNN.)

Ultimately, Merrill said they just wanted time to figure things out. Just enough time, I thought, for me to leave New Hampshire.

The bottom line is that for whatever half-baked reason, the Clinton campaign has decided that it wants to control which reporters, from which news organizations, can come along for the ride and report their impressions of what's going on.

That's not okay. It's the kind of thing that raises questions about transparency and launches let-them-eat-cake metaphors.

The Clinton campaign asked the press to set up the pool. But just like the White House pool – which is run by the White House Correspondents Association, not the Obama administration – Merrill and his team don't get to pick and choose who's on duty.

(That's decided by a rotating schedule.)

I showed up in Rochester on Monday morning, found the YMCA where the Clinton event was being held, and walked through the front door. A Secret Service agent wouldn't let me go any further.
Clinton's Secret Service detail drove her to New Hampshire in the famous 'Scooby' van, dropping her off Monday morning for a forum on early childhood education – which DailyMail.com was forbidden to cover

He sent me to another door, where the agent in charge of Clinton's protection detail heard who I work for and said, 'Oh. No.' I was sent back to door number one.

The first agent called a campaign staffer, and then told me that a final decision had been reached: I couldn't come in.

He also told me that for security reasons, I couldn't walk down the hall to use the bathroom.

'Hit the woods,' was his advice.

The question remains: Why?

As well as its huge US audience, DailyMail.com has a larger online audience than any other English-language newspaper in the world. More than 225 million unique visitors come to our website every month. Every political campaign worth its salt should welcome a news organization of our size and influence to show up, kick the tires and report what's going on.

Smaller outlets, too, including those with foreign ownership, should be welcome. Candidates and their handlers shouldn't have a say.

I suspect the decision has little to do with where my employers are from, and a lot to do with how we cover the news.

DailyMail.com doesn't hire stenographers. We chase stories aggressively. We don't pull punches. As a British-owned outlet, we don't institutionally have a dog in the U.S. election fight.

We genuinely haven’t already decided which candidates we want to see get the nominations or which party’s candidate eventually win.

We tell it as we see it – without fear and without favor to any side.

Two days ago, after Clinton delivered a speech in New York City to re-launch her campaign, I tweeted my view of scribes who 'reported exactly, and only, what the campaign wanted them to.' I don’t believe in coincidences.

I've followed Clinton's motorcade as it sped past a small New Hampshire airport, drove all the way to Boston, and deposited her on a large jet that had First Class seats.

I got on the plane and watched her in a Washington, D.C. airport, asking her the campaign’s first questions about the Benghazi terror attack. She met me with stone silence.

After a Clinton photo-op at a bakery in April, I reported that the kitchen staff didn't want to come out and shake her hand.

The nature of Clinton's very first small-scale event in Iowa – an intimate and apparently unscripted coffee-shop meet and greet – was called into question after I spoke to an attendee who said all of Clinton's table-mates were vetted and driven there by a political operative.

I get it: This kind of reporting doesn't make DailyMail.com the Clinton campaign's favorite outlet.

In the land of the free press, it's the journalists acting on behalf of readers – not the politicians acting in their own self-interest – who get to decide what's important and who's hiding the ball. We have to show up to get these stories. They can’t be covered via Google. And that’s why controlling who shows up is the equivalent of torching the free press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Via email and telephone calls, I've heard from about 50 political journalists today, including some from nearly every major news brand I can think of.
No one who spoke to me thinks Clinton has a leg to stand on.

Journalists who do this job every day know the stakes: If we're going to elect a president who believes she's above meaningful scrutiny this early in the campaign, just imagine what things might be like in the West Wing in 2017.

That goes for everyone on the Republican side of the ledger too. (Welcome to the race, Jeb! And it's your turn tomorrow, Mr. Trump.)

At dinnertime I headed to Monday's other 'pooled' press event, a Clinton keynote speech at the Manchester City Democratic Committee's annual dinner commemorating Flag Day.

They shut me out again, meaning that fewer people will learn what she has to say. That's ridiculous. And fans of the First Amendment may as well switch out that flag for a white one.

A press aide told me: 'You're not on the pool list so you need to leave.'
Daily Mail Online has reached out to Nick Merrill, spokesman for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign more than a half-dozen times today and have yet to hear back.

Longtime Hillary Clinton Confidant to Testify About Benghazi Emails // VOA News - June 16, 2015

A longtime confidant to former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will testify Tuesday before a special congressional committee investigating the 2012 deadly attack on the U.S. diplomatic outpost in Benghazi, Libya.

Sidney Blumenthal will tell the House Select Committee on Benghazi in a closed door session about a series of emails he sent to Clinton about the situation in Libya after the overthrow of longtime dictator Moammar Gadhafi in 2011. Blumenthal has been close to both Hillary Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, ever since he served as aide to Clinton during his administration. He sent the emails to the personal email account Hillary Clinton used during her tenure as secretary of state, a process which led to massive criticism and charges that she was hiding information.

Blumenthal turned over the emails to the committee last week in response to a subpoena. The emails were not part of the hundreds of emails involving the Benghazi attack that the State Department turned over to the House panel earlier this year.

The attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi left four Americans dead, including Ambassador to Libya Christopher Stevens.

Clinton, the front-runner for the nomination to represent the Democratic Party in the 2016 presidential election, admitted to using a private server and email address during her tenure as secretary of state from 2009 to 2013.

The personal email account she used was hosted on a private server in her New York state home instead of a government one. She has said she used a private account because it was more convenient and points out that she violated no rules.

'Only the facts'

A spokeswoman for the committee, Amanda Duvall, said the GOP-led panel "is only interested in the facts," adding that Blumenthal was called to testify because of the large number of emails he sent Clinton regarding Libya.

Hillary Clinton's earlier efforts to hire Blumenthal, who has spent nearly two decades working for the Clinton family, as a State Department employee were rejected by White House aides. Those aides feared that Blumenthal's role spreading harsh attacks against Barack Obama in the 2008 presidential primaries would cause discomfort within the Obama administration.

Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, R-Ga., said he and other committee members want to know the depth of Blumenthal's involvement in Libya policy, why he had the information and who gave it to him.

The five Democrats on the Benghazi panel said their Republican colleagues were no longer interested in discovering facts about Benghazi, but merely were trying to prove that Clinton "engaged in some sort of conspiracy" over the attacks.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., the senior Democrat on the panel, said Blumenthal's deposition was the latest example of how the committee "has strayed far from investigating the Benghazi attacks and is now focused like a laser on attacking Secretary Clinton in her run for president."

Cummings called it a "travesty" that the committee has spent more than $3.5 million on what he called a "partisan fishing expedition with no end in sight."

Blumenthal was willing to testify yet was served with a subpoena by armed marshals, Cummings said. He called the subpoena, issued by the panel's chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., "abusive" and difficult to understand.

Hillary Clinton's cam paign isn't about populist ideals. It's about Hillary Clinton. // The Week // Edward Morrissey - June 16, 2015

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton tried for a populist reboot of her meticulously stage-managed campaign over the weekend. But look beyond the spin, and you'll see the former secretary of state offered nothing new or exciting or bold. In fact, her big speech was less a reboot than it was a rerun.

Hillary Clinton has essentially spent the past 15 years running for president. Returning to the White House is the singular motivation driving everything in her public life. The Clintons' strategy as they prepared to leave the White House in early 2001 could not have been clearer. They intended to make their departure temporary, preferably returning at the end of an Al Gore presidency, by having the first lady establish her credibility by building her own career in electoral politics. The Clintons seized on an open Senate seat in New York, and expected to launch their second bid for the White House after an easy re-election bid in 2006.

That strategy worked — sort of. Gore lost a nail-biter election in 2000 to George W. Bush, which made a Democratic bid in 2008 even easier. The Clintons had leveraged their political power through Sen. Clinton's Capitol Hill career and with their family foundation, collecting chits from Wall Street and party movers and shakers. Team Clinton ran the 2008 presidential campaign as a preordained coronation, betting that the bitterness of the Bush era meant a good environment for Clinton nostalgia. Unfortunately for the Clintons, Democrats didn't want to embrace the past. They chose the future, in the form of one Barack Obama.

The Clinton project was far from over, however. Hillary Clinton took the job of secretary of state to add executive and foreign-policy experience to her resume, after embarrassing herself in the 2008 campaign by claiming foreign-policy expertise with the lie that she'd landed in Tuzla under fire during the Balkans wars. After four years at the State Department, Clinton left in early 2013. It was the first time in 20 years that both Bill and Hillary Clinton had no official office in the federal government. They did not plan on keeping it that way for long.

Clinton soon published her second memoir, Hard Choices. It revealed little insight and offered even less political conviction. The lackluster reviews got overshadowed by Clinton's claims to have been "dead broke" coming out of the White House while she and Bill earned millions in advances for their first two books. After a few weeks, Team Clinton slipped off the public stage to recalibrate.

Clinton came back early this year — and once again, she appeared to have nothing to add to the political conversation. She just really, really wanted to be president.

Meanwhile, a series of scandals involving the Clinton Foundation, her secret email system while at the State Department, and questions about the connections between Bill Clinton's paydays and entities having business before the State Department dominated the headlines. Clinton offered no serious answers to any of those scandals.

Nor did she do much talking about anything else as she traveled through the key early primary states over the next three months. She avoided clearly staking out policy positions. She dodged reporters. Even in her claimed areas of policy expertise, Clinton and her team refused to get pinned down — on ISIS strategy and on the Trade Promotion Authority in particular. While the progressives she courted rallied to embarrass President Obama on trade, all Team Clinton would concede was that the candidate was keeping an open mind on the matter.

With the campaign hiding behind skittish generics, Clinton and her advisers decided to hype a reboot. They staged a big speech on Roosevelt Island in New York City, and played it up as though it would be a re-debut. The media gathered to hear Clinton finally stake out her positions and her agenda. And once again, Team Clinton offered a rerun.

The Atlantic's Molly Ball found it "almost aggressively pedestrian," in "a surprisingly small venue that did not fill up." Ball argued that Clinton offered "a barrage of proposals," but a read of the speech transcript shows that Clinton offered at best a laundry list of traditional liberal agenda items, none of which would distinguish her from almost any other Democratic presidential contender. It more closely resembled a State of the Union speech than a campaign call to arms, especially in the manner in which it was delivered. "Clinton read it slowly off the teleprompter," Ball wrote to describe the "flat" delivery, "articulating every word, sometimes with odd emphasis, in a near-monotone."

As if to underline the dustiness of her tired strategy and message, the former secretary of state decided to use a

50-year-old pop-culture reference to attack Republicans. "Now, there may be some new voices in the presidential Republican choir," Clinton said in one of the few moments that showed any dynamism, "but they're all singing the same old song — a song called 'Yesterday.'"

The Beatles recorded that ballad 50 years ago this month, when Hillary Clinton graduated from high school. Marco Rubio, who wouldn't be born for another six years, has campaigned this spring in part on the slogan that "Yesterday is over." His team leaped to take advantage of the contradiction, and Clinton's case of projection.

Even more telling, though, was the lack of any substance on issues that are priorities for American voters. She weighed in with no particularly interesting or surprising stands on America's hottest debates. She made just one passing reference to trade that offered no insight whatsoever on TPA or the massive Pacific trade deal that House Democrats all but submarined last week. She made passing mention of foreign policy and national security by pledging — wait for it — to "do whatever it takes to keep Americans safe." After four years at State, one would expect her to elaborate on exactly what whatever looks like, but Clinton offered nothing at all. The only reference to creating jobs in the entire speech was part of her pledge to fight climate change — a very low priority for American voters — and promised that "this will create millions of jobs and countless new businesses." Barack Obama promised that, too. How did that work out?

This was not a relaunch, let alone a reboot. The event turned out to be just another Saturday afternoon rerun. And it's a movie we've seen many times before: The Clintons lust for power, not to affect populist change on a national scale, but to accrue power for the Clintons.

2016 Is the Latest Bump in the Long Clinton-Bush Friendship // NY Mag // Margaret Hartmann – June 16, 2015

After months of speculation, it's finally official: the 2016 election will be a showdown between the Bush and Clinton political dynasties – that is, if Jeb manages to claw his way to the front of the GOP pack. Pundits are already placing bets on which house will win 2016's (relatively tame) game of thrones. "If you're having a battle of dynasties, the Clinton dynasty is gonna beat the Bush dynasty every time," former Obama senior adviser Dan Pfeiffer told CNN on Monday.

While the Bushes and Clintons have proven that they're fiercely dedicated to electing whatever family member happens to be running, the two families may actually have a healthier view of the competition. Over the past two decades, they've gone from being political enemies to declaring themselves as close as family, only to lash out again when another election rolls around. He's a recap of the drama behind Hillary and Jeb's potential showdown.

In the 1992, Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton managed to make George H.W. Bush a one-term president by attacking him on the economy and painting him as out of touch. Character played a large role in the campaign (and it remains a theme in the Bush/Clinton relationship), with Republicans attacking Clinton for his infidelities, draft dodging, and marijuana use.

In one of the harsher debate moments from the 1992 election, President Bush attacked Governor Clinton's patriotism and lack of military service (though he claimed he wasn't), saying he found it "impossible to understand" how Clinton could organize anti-Vietnam War demonstrations while studying in England, as men his age were serving their country. Clinton shot back with a Senator Joe McCarthy comparison, and praised the president's father, Senator Prescott Bush, for standing up to the Red Scare.

Jeb and Hillary got in some jabs as well, though they left the most vicious attacks to other campaign surrogates. In a local news interview captured by C-SPAN, Hillary called out the first couple by name, accusing them of "launching these untrue attacks against me" after previously thanking her for her work on children's issues. "They know what my husband and I have stood for, and it's just kind of sad that in the heat of a political battle when they're behind and they can't run on their record and they have no plan for the future that they would engage in these kinds of tactics," she said.

In a 1992 interview that aired on C-SPAN, Jeb said he had a problem with Governor Clinton's "series of deceptive comments and statements," but at another point he had a prescient prediction. "I know my dad well, and win or lose, he'll shake Bill Clinton's hand, look him in the eye and say 'you fought the good fight' and not hold anything against him personally, or his family," Jeb said.

Hillary Clinton and Barbara Bush represented two very different generations of women, and they were pitted against each other in the media – particularly after Clinton quipped that she chose to be an attorney rather than staying home to "bake cookies and have tea."

However, immediately after the election they had a friendly meeting at the White House, and during a Christmas event the first lady went out of her way to praise Clinton and urge the press to "give her a break." "I hope you all will treat her like you treated me," she told reporters. "Wait til she makes her mistakes. You waited until I made mine."

Once they were all full-fledged members of the "presidents club," the Bushes and Clintons managed to remain cordial at the occasional events where all former White House inhabitants are required to assemble.

Senator Hillary Clinton was frequently at odds with the George W. Bush administration, but recently she had some kind words about her effort to lobby the president for aid to New York post-9/11. "President Bush looked at us and said, 'What do you need?' And I said, 'We need $20 billion to rebuild New York Mr. President.' And he said, 'You got it.' I will never forget that," Clinton said. "If you don't build relationships with people and all you do is show up to argue and show up to point fingers, you can't get anything done."

Then as both presidents assisted with relief efforts following the Asian tsunami in 2005, a friendship blossomed between Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush. "I thought I knew him; but until this trip I did not really know him," 41 said of traveling with his former rival in February of that year.

They worked together again when Hurricane Katrina hit in 2006, and afterward Bush wrote Clinton a note about how much he appreciated their friendship, and alluded to Hillary's potential 2008 run. "The politics between now and two years from now might put pressure on our friendship, but it is my view that it will survive," he wrote.

January 2014, Barbara Bush described the relationship, telling C-SPAN, "I love Bill Clinton."

While the two presidents regularly visit each other's homes and it appears their father-son dynamic is genuine, the relationship has also been played up in the media by members of both clans. "A friendship with the older, steadier Bush conferred a legitimacy on Clinton that he had partly squandered in his final years in office," Time magazine journalists Nancy Gibbs and Michael Duffy wrote in their book The Presidents Club. "For Bush, the political math was just as obvious — and even closer to home: his son, the president, was a divisive figure across the nation and having the spiritual leader of the Democratic Party as a partner made it more likely that the forty-second president would deliver his criticisms of the forty-third in a kinder, gentler fashion."

While the Clinton team was accused of pulling the "W" off keyboards before vacating the White House, Bill bonded with the younger Bush too when they both pitched in after Haiti's earthquake in 2010. In November 2014, W. told Sean Hannity he wasn't worried about campaigning against his family's adopted "black sheep son" in 2016. "It means that Bill and I are going to have to have some interesting things to talk about," Bush said, adding, "Look, I'll still like him when Jeb beats Hillary."

Hillary and Jeb's role in all this Bush-Clinton camaraderie is hazy. W. has said the former secretary of state is like his "sister-in-law," and two years ago, his daughter Barbara Bush said she hoped she would run for president, calling her "unbelievably accomplished." (Though she added that she didn't know who her opponent would be, and wouldn't necessarily be voting for her.)

But Jeb is actually the Bush who's offered the lengthiest public ode to Hillary – which according to several conservative groups, is why the former Florida governor is "unelectable." As chairman of the National Constitution Center, in 2013 Bush was tasked with awarding Clinton the organization's Liberty Medal. He praised Clinton for her "lifelong career in public service," and joked, "Hillary and I come from different political parties and we disagree about lots of things. But we do agree on the wisdom of the American people — especially those in Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina."

In her speech, Clinton joked that bipartisanship had become a "family tradition" thanks to the relationship between the former presidents. "[Jeb and I] also share something that is far more important than any of our political differences," she said. "We both love this country and we believe in the wisdom of our founders and the constitution."

It appears the ex-presidents are still on good terms, but Hillary and Jeb began taking shots at each other, and the opposing administration, before they even declared they were running. Last month on Face the Nation, Bush blasted the Clinton Foundation for its lack of transparency. "It turns out that the rules don't always apply consistently for the Clintons," he said.

And two weeks ago, Jeb was among the 2016 candidates Clinton called out by name for allegedly restricting voting rights. "In Florida, when Jeb Bush was governor, state authorities conducted a deeply flawed purge of voters before the presidential election in 2000," she said.

Clinton even got a shout out – in the form of a widely mocked "that's what she said" – as Bush officially announced his candidacy on Monday.

It looks like the truce between the Bushes and the Clintons may be off, at least until it's politically expedient for them to be friends again.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'MALLEY

Martin O'Malley pins hope on Iowa caucuses // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – June 15, 2015

Martin O'Malley makes his way to the back of a crowded pub on a rainy night. He grabs a chair and climbs up.

"I'm running for president of the United States and I need your help," he says, holding his right hand on his chest. He promises not to talk long. "We are going to do Q&A because that is the Iowa way."

For O'Malley the Iowa way is the only way. The former Maryland governor's narrow path to the Democratic nomination hinges on persuading people at this bar and in homes across the state to support him in the caucuses seven months from now, longtime advisers and donors agree. A strong second, or even an upset, is possible here in a way that isn't in the cards anywhere else.

He knows it, too; that's why he and a crew of staff piled into a white sport utility vehicle and drove at breakneck speeds past rain-soaked farms from event to event last week. Even though O'Malley's name remains unfamiliar to many Iowans, and he still barely registers in that state's polls, political elites have talked of an O'Malley presidential run since his early days as Baltimore's mayor.

Still, the already faint track to victory for him in 2016 has been muddied recently by several factors out of O'Malley's immediate control.

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has vacuumed up voters on the left who are skeptical of Hillary Rodham Clinton, landing him in the valuable second-place berth here that could ignite a candidacy. And riots in Baltimore beamed some of America's most hopeless neighborhoods into homes across the country, undercutting O'Malley's message of progress in that city.

Both of these issues came up at campaign events in Iowa last week, and O'Malley stayed resolute in a commitment to keep showing up in the state and take sometimes uncomfortable questions. When asked at his third press conference of the day how much time he plans to spend here he said: "As much time as I possibly can."

The trip to Iowa was O'Malley's 10th since January 2014. He has made eight trips to New Hampshire — including one Saturday — and four trips to South Carolina in the same time period.

A super PAC supporting O'Malley's candidacy has so far run TV ads in three cities, all of them in Iowa. The campaign opened a Des Moines office the day O'Malley announced his presidential campaign (it's the only one he has outside Baltimore). Last week, he had about a half-dozen Iowa staff and volunteers collecting e-mail addresses and passing out "O'Malley for president" stickers.

Still, O'Malley's late start — his May 30 announcement was six weeks after Clinton and a month after Sanders — means he missed a critical window where he could have soaked up news coverage in the state.

Clinton's campaign was always going to be an oxygen-sucking bonfire, but Sanders used his headstart on O'Malley to define himself, in the absence of an Elizabeth Warren candidacy, as the liberal alternative. The Vermont senator got three standing ovations from an audience of more than 700 people Friday evening at Drake University before he even opened his mouth.

Advisers believe O'Malley, 52, will emerge as the more electable alternative to the 73-year-old Sanders, particularly after voters realize that both are running on a similar populist message.

"I think Bernie is a bit of a stalking horse," said George Appleby, O'Malley's state chairman. "He's putting those issues on the table."

Appleby and O'Malley both know well how a low-polling candidate can catch fire in Iowa. In 1983, both organized for Gary Hart, another long-shot candidate, who saw his chances lifted by finishing second in the 1984 Iowa caucuses.

"He knows how to run in Iowa," Appleby said, as he stood in a kitchen while O'Malley spoke in the living room at a Marshalltown house party. "Coming out and doing this over and over."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The work has yet to pay off. O'Malley remains stuck in the low single digits in Iowa polls, compared to the mid-teens for Sanders (Clinton is at a whopping 60 percent). But he has clearly made some of the right connections. At the Iowa City pub, O'Malley was introduced by Kevin Kinney, a Democratic state senator for whom O'Malley raised money last year. Hours earlier Mark Smith, the top Democrat in the Iowa House, did the same in Marshalltown.

"The thing about O'Malley is he gets things done and he does them with respect," said Sarah Stutler, a preschool teacher who has heard him several times, including in Mount Vernon Thursday. "He is Biden-esque," she added, comparing him to the vice president.

O'Malley is careful never to criticize his opponents by name on the trip; when their names come up, he says he has respect for both of them. However, his most powerful line, and one he didn't repeat at all last week in Iowa, takes aim at both Clinton and former Florida governor Jeb Bush, a GOP favorite.

"The presidency of the United States is not some crown to be passed between two families," he said in an ABC interview in March. "It is an awesome and sacred trust that is to be earned and exercised on behalf of the American people."

Questions about how O'Malley can win over supporters dogged him at every stop.

"Can you tell me why I should change my support from Bernie Sanders to you?" asked Dorie Tammen, shouting her question to O'Malley through a screen window at a sweaty house party in Marshalltown.

O'Malley stresses his relative youth in the field and his 15 years of executive experience. Progressive highlights of his eight years as governor include ending the death penalty, allowing illegal immigrants to pay lower in-state university tuition, expanding gun control laws, raising the minimum wage, and approving same-sex marriage.

Yet it is O'Malley's record as Baltimore's mayor that is getting the closest scrutiny from Iowa voters. Faced with a persistently high murder rate, O'Malley ushered in an era of zero-tolerance policing that was imported directly from Rudy Giuliani's New York City. Some, including Baltimore's current mayor, have pointed to those O'Malley-era policies as the point where relations frayed between police and the policed in Baltimore.

In the Iowa pub, one woman asked a lengthy and detailed question about his law enforcement record.

"As mayor of Baltimore you oversaw an era of mass arrests," she said, recounting the hundreds of thousands of people arrested on his watch.

He responded by saying that violent crime was a scourge when he took over, and it plummeted on his watch.

"You weren't in Baltimore in 1999," O'Malley said, "but I was."

SANDERS

Meet the people coming to see Bernie Sanders in Iowa // WaPo // John Wagner – June 15, 2015

As the Democratic presidential field descended on Iowa this weekend, Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit generated more headlines -- but Democratic rival Bernie Sanders drew more people.

The independent senator from Vermont, who rails against greedy corporate interests ruining the country's democracy, drew overflow audiences nearly everywhere he went here over the weekend.

That included Des Moines, where close to 800 people streamed to a university auditorium on Friday night, and Waterloo, where more than 500 people gathered in a theater on Sunday afternoon.

The Vermont senator had the support of 16 percent of likely Democratic caucusgoers in a Des Moines Register/ Bloomberg News Iowa poll earlier this month, to Clinton's 57 percent.

So who's coming to hear him speak?

This weekend, there were those fully sold on the self-described democratic socialist -- they were the ones wearing "Bernie for president" t-shirts and holding the "Feel the Bern" signs. There were some others shopping for an alternative to Clinton, the formidable front-runner. Still others were merely curious about the fuss surrounding the frumpy politician who's seen his poll numbers surge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Terry Pensel, a Web developer who traveled more than 90 minutes from Guttenberg to see Sanders in Waterloo, was among those in the fully-sold category.

“I don’t want to bash Hillary Clinton or any of the other Democrats, but I don’t see them having a plan to deal with the concentrated wealth,” said Pensel, 47, as he left the auditorium with several yard signs and bumper stickers tucked under his arm. “They’re giving lip service to a lot of the issues Bernie has been talking about for a long, long time.”

Those issues, as Sanders described them, include the the “grotesque level of wealth and income inequality” in the country, the corrosive effects of big money on politics and the “disastrous” trade deals the country has entered into.

While Pensel was clearly pumped up about Sanders’s prospects, he also complained that the media -- the corporate-controlled media, as he described it -- has given Clinton so much more attention than Sanders.

Tara Monson, meanwhile, was fired up about Sanders even before he appeared at a union hall in Marshalltown on Saturday.

The 31-year-old mother of two arrived with her 6-month-old daughter in a carrier on her chest. The carrier sported a Bernie button, and Munson’s daughter was wearing a bow and a homemade “Feel the Bern” t-shirt.

“I never really heard of Bernie Sanders until he started running, and he’s really grabbed me,” said Monson, who performs audits for a goat farm. “He brings a different ball to the game.”

Monson said she particularly liked what Sanders has been saying about policies affecting families. He is calling for guaranteed vacation, family leave and sick time and says Americans should be working fewer hours. One of the biggest laughs Sanders gets on the trail comes from rattling off how many more hours a year Americans work than the French.

“My husband has been trying to get me to move to a socialist country for years,” said Monson, whose spouse hails from Norway. “Now I’m telling him it might come here.”

On a more serious note, she said that she’s not a big Clinton fan and thinks “it’s a little ridiculous that the Democratic party is just letting her have the spotlight.”

For every fan like Pensel and Monson who attended Sanders events, though, it seemed there was also someone like Ed Canade, who said he likes what the senator has to say but has some reservations about making him the party’s nominee.

Canade, a 68-year-old semi-retired paramedic, said he considers Clinton “a polarizing candidate” and is looking for an alternative. But he wasn’t ready to commit to Sanders after seeing him in Marshalltown.

“He kind of speaks with a grumpy-old-man kind of tone,” Canade said of Sanders, who is 73. “I don’t know if people are going to find that appealing.”

Canade said Sanders also doesn’t look the part of a president, adding: “I know glamor and appearance are a thing in politics.”

Canade said he is considering another Democratic candidate, former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley. But, he said, “I’m concerned that he’s this unknown at this point in the race.”

Kathleen Murrin, who came to see Sanders Friday night in Des Moines, said she can envision Sanders as the Democratic nominee, dismissing talk by pundits that Sanders would have a hard time winning a general election.

“Have you looked at the Republicans who’ve come into this state?” asked Murrin, 68, who works for a nonprofit organization focused on mental health issues.

Sanders, Murrin said, has “got real solutions that he’s talking about. And he’s got real heart.”

Still, she said she’s not ready to commit. For her, it’s partly a sense of duty.

“I’m an Iowan,” Murrin said, pledging to check out other candidates as well. “We have a long way to go to the caucuses.”

She said she has her doubts about Hillary -- “she’s very polarizing and tried this before” -- and said she just doesn’t know that much about O’Malley or the other Democrats.

Lance Wilson, who caught Sanders on Saturday night at a labor dinner in Cedar Rapids, said he admires Sanders for running at a time when Clinton's presence kept many other Democrats out of the presidential race.

"Because Hillary is so big, other candidates don't want to step out," Wilson said. "What I like about Bernie is he's willing to step out."

Wilson, 36, works in collections for a company that makes car loans. Many of the people he talks to are down on their luck, he said, and what Sanders is saying should resonate with them. Wilson also thinks Clinton is too much of a centrist and likes Sanders's candor.

"He says what needs to be said rather than what people want to hear," Wilson said.

Dan Friedrichs, co-chairman of the Boone County Democrats, made a similar point in the Marshalltown union hall, where he came to see Sanders on Saturday.

"What people like is he shoots from the hip, but he has something substantive to say," Friedrichs said. "He's talking the language the middle class wants to hear: Protect us. That's what Bernie is all about."

A retired teacher, Friedrichs said he particularly likes Sanders call for free public university tuition and universal pre-kindergarten. But for now, Friedrichs said, he's encouraging people to see all the Democratic candidates before making a final decision.

Bob Handel, a semi-retired real estate agent, is among those who don't need any more convincing. A self-described "Sanders groupie," Handel traveled from Davenport to Cedar Rapids on Saturday to catch yet another appearance by the Vermont senator.

Handel said that the race should be about issues, and that there's too much about Clinton that detracts from that -- the email controversy, countless articles about the Clinton Foundation's donors and the Benghazi controversy.

Sanders, meanwhile, has a message that should resonate broadly, Handel argued.

"If people get past the socialism and just hear him, these aren't far-out, crazy ideas," he said. "I think people are going to get behind him."

Early-state polls hint at Bernie Sanders surge // Politico // Nick Gass – June 15, 2015

In a trio of new polls in early primary states, Hillary Clinton leads Democratic rivals in Iowa, South Carolina and New Hampshire.

It's in the Granite State, however, where the former secretary of state's standing is the least rock-solid, according to new polls conducted by Morning Consult.

Among Democratic voters who say they will participate in the state's primary next year, 44 percent back Clinton. Next up: independent Sen. Bernie Sanders, the self-described socialist from neighboring Vermont, who grabs 32 percent. Vice President Joe Biden, who has shown little inclination to run, claims 8 percent of likely Democratic voters.

In Iowa, Clinton picked up 54 percent, with no other candidate over 20 percent. Sanders grabbed the next closest, at 12 percent. In South Carolina, 56 percent of likely primary voters expressed support.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and former Rhode Island Sen. and Gov. Lincoln Chafee polled low in all three early states.

The survey polled 905 registered voters in Iowa, including 313 likely Democratic caucus-goers; 906 registered voters in South Carolina, including 309 likely Democratic primary voters; and 816 registered voters in New Hampshire, including 279 likely Democratic voters.

The overall margin of error for each state is plus-or-minus 3 percentage points, while the margin of error for Democratic respondents in all three states is plus-or-minus 6 percentage points.

Bernie Sanders Is Building an Army to Take D.C. // The Daily Beast // Eleanor Chift – June 15, 2015

Bernie Sanders is mad as hell and he's not going to take it anymore. That's why he's running for president. He's filled with righteous anger about a lot of things, and lots of people agree with him. Close to a thousand people turned out to see him in New Hampshire; 750 in Iowa, one of the largest crowds for any of the candidates. He's “bulking up” now in terms of his campaign staff and he’s doing pretty well fundraising, too: With 200,000 contributors at 40 bucks a piece, that's $8 million dollars.

“We’re going to be outspent, but it doesn’t matter,” he says. “We can run the kind of campaign I want.” His kind of campaign is about the big challenges facing the country, income inequality, climate change, the unaffordability of college, a disappearing middle class. He speaks about these issues with an ever present edge of outrage, what he calls “from my heart,” that lets you know he’s not just spouting briefing papers, these are his causes.

The reception he's gotten in the four or five weeks since he announced his candidacy has persuaded him that maybe the country's disgust with politics as usual has created an opening for somebody like him, a 73-year-old self-described "democratic socialist" who calls out the excesses of Wall Street and stands up for working families. "It is not a radical agenda," he told reporters at a breakfast organized by The Christian Science Monitor.

He wants to expand Social Security, move away from Obamacare to Medicare for all, and make tuition free at public universities. He would pay for these expanded benefits with a tax on Wall Street speculative trading, and he would end the loopholes that allow corporations to store their profits tax-free offshore. He doesn't expect support from the Business Roundtable, the Chamber of Commerce, or Wall Street, he says with delight, treating their opposition like a badge of honor.

There's nothing wrong with running to get your ideas heard, he says, but he insists he's in the race to win, however improbable that is given Hillary Clinton's big lead, and his own marginal status as a national candidate given his age and leftist politics. Asked what Clinton's biggest vulnerability is in a debate setting, he says, "I like Hillary Clinton, I respect Hillary Clinton, I disagree with Hillary Clinton...We don't have to make these campaigns personal, but we do have to discuss these issues."

"I like Hillary Clinton, I respect Hillary Clinton, I disagree with Hillary Clinton...We don't have to make these campaigns personal, but we do have to discuss these issues."
He wants to know what "the Secretary" thinks about the Keystone pipeline. He led the fight against it and believes climate change is a "planetary crisis." Where is she on the trade debate roiling the Congress? Asked if Clinton's vote for the Iraq war should disqualify her from the presidency, he said no, that he didn't intend to bring up that years-ago vote. (Someone else will.)

Listening to Sanders is like going back to the future. He is introducing legislation that would guarantee workers 10 days of vacation. These are the kinds of victories that labor unions won decades ago, but that are under assault in a Wall Street-driven economy. Sanders recalled American workers a century ago held up placards that said, "Give us a 40-hour week." Today, he says, millions of Americans don't have that guarantee because they're working two, three, four jobs to get by.

Asked what his first executive order would be as president, he was stumped, admitting he hadn't thought about that yet. He used the question to segue into the impact of big money on everything that goes on in Washington, and the reality that no one person can make the changes that he is advocating for. "I have a lot of respect and admiration for Barack Obama," he said, but the "biggest mistake" he made after running "one of the great campaigns in American history" was saying to the legions of people who supported him, "Thank you very much for electing me, I'll take it from here."

"I will not make that mistake," Sanders said, making a pitch for a mobilized grassroots movement that every candidate dreams of and that in '08 Obama came closest to achieving. The Obama movement faltered amidst legal issues once he was in the White House, and in '12 became Organizing for America, primarily a vehicle for fundraising and a shadow of what it once was. Sanders sounds like the political science major he was in college, explaining that the free tuition in public universities he seeks will not happen if it comes down to President Sanders negotiating with Republican leader Mitch McConnell. "It will happen,”he says, “if a million young people are marching on Washington."

The challenge for the Democratic nominee is to generate the kind of excitement that led to Obama's election and reelection. Among the issues that get Sanders most exercised is the "massive alienation among the American people" that leads to low voter turnout. If 60 percent and more of eligible voters don't vote, "nothing significant will change," he says. He is not happy about the Democratic National Committee scheduling only six debates, beginning in the fall, and decreeing if candidates participate in other debates, they will not be allowed in the sanctioned ones. "It's much too limited," he said. "Debates are a means to get people interested and engaged."

If it were up to him, candidates would debate across party lines. "Republicans have gotten away with murder because a lot of people don't know what their agenda is," he says. "Christie, Perry, Bush are all in favor of cutting Social Security. I want to expand it. Let's have that debate," he says. Sanders has never played party politics. He's the great disrupter. He's there to break the rules and regulations, and the voters are cheering him on.

Bernie Sanders Can Win the Iowa Caucus // The Observer // Brent Budowsky – June 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let me be the first commentator to state explicitly what many Democratic insiders fear and many of the most progressive activists in the party yearn for: There is a very real prospect that Senator Bernie Sanders wins an outright victory in the Iowa caucus and pulls off one of the most stunning upsets in modern political history.

At this moment I would put the odds that Mr. Sanders upsets Hillary Clinton in the Iowa caucus at nearly 40 percent. As someone who can fairly be called a Democratic insider myself, I can report that some of the smartest Democratic strategists in national politics privately believe this but will not publicly state it. I just did.

To fully understand the powerful forces at work within the Democratic Party and national politics, and why Bernie Sanders has suddenly vaulted to a clear second place in the race for the Democratic nomination, lets briefly consider political events in the three days that began last Friday and ended on Sunday.

First, on Friday, President Obama was rebuked by Democrats in the House of Representatives over the fast track trade legislation which led—at least for now—to the bill being defeated in the House.

Then, on Saturday, Hillary Clinton made a major speech in New York in which she echoed many of the themes of progressive populist Democrats while appearing to wrap herself around the political mantle of President Obama with language so compelling it gave credence to the Republican charge that she is running for the third Obama term. I would emphasize—and this is important—that while Clinton was embracing Obama, progressives remember that not long ago Obama was personally and politically insulting prominent progressives such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), which I have previously written about in the Observer.

Next, on Sunday, Mr. Sanders and Ms. Clinton were both campaigning in Iowa, where he again aggressively opposed the trade bill and she implied that she would be a stronger trade negotiator than the president but again took no position on the trade bill.

Bernie Sanders took a position of conviction and purpose opposing the trade bill, while Hillary Clinton took a position that the Washington Post today correctly reported left her “a lot of wiggle room.”
The common denominators during these three days were that Bernie Sanders took a position of conviction and purpose opposing the trade bill, while Hillary Clinton took a position that the Washington Post today correctly reported left her “a lot of wiggle room” by failing to take any position on the trade bill.

These three days, from Friday through Sunday, are a microcosm of the forces at work within the Democratic Party that began in Washington and arrived in the heart of Iowa during campaigning for the caucus vote by the frontrunner candidate and her closest competitor.

The reason that Bernie Sanders has a viable chance of defeating Clinton in the Iowa caucus is that caucus elections involve a far smaller pool of voters than primary elections. In the caucus variation of “one person, one vote,” the candidate who can best inspire fervent supporters to attend a caucus on a frigid Iowa evening is the candidate who will win. A student at an Iowa college has the same “one vote” as the chair of the Democratic Party of an Iowa county.

In Washington Elizabeth Warren has seized the mantle of being the progressive conscience of the United States Senate, while in Iowa and other states Bernie Sanders is seizing the mantle of being the progressive conscience of the campaign for the Democratic nomination for president at a time when the progressive movement is on the ascendancy in national politics.

Mr. Sanders is the ultimate conviction politician in American politics. He is the epitome of authenticity. You will never see Mr. Sanders give paid speeches to big banks or Wall Street firms. Nor do his supporters dream of making their financial fortunes as highly paid lobbyists for special interests in Washington.

When the evening of the Iowa caucus arrives it is very possible that political experts and insiders will be astonished and confounded by the sudden appearance of new caucus participants who have never attended party meetings or caucus votes, and trudge through frigid cold and piles of snow to cast their caucus vote for Bernie Sanders.

Politics is similar to the concept of alternative universes in theoretical physics. Most political reporting in major media comes out of the universe of political insiders, where insider reporters report what they hear from insider politicians.

There is an alternate universe to this, which I would call “The Real America,” which is often missed by political insiders, which is why pundits are so often wrong.

In this alternate universe of real Americans who are suspicious of political insiders, there are people with passions and principles who are occasionally inspired to participate in politics in ways that are missed by the mainstream media until a shocking event unfolds in real time.

It is very possible that such an event could occur in the Iowa caucus in 2016, when Mr. Sanders inspires a wave of participation from highly motivated and idealistic outsiders who suddenly descend on the caucuses and carry him to a victory that will shock and stun the political establishment and political media.

This column will cause great consternation among my friends in the Clinton campaign, but I would argue that the surge Mr. Sanders could ultimately prove a blessing in disguise for Hillary Clinton. The Sanders challenge will make her a stronger and better candidate and if she is nominated, Mr. Sanders could be a kingmaker if not a king by rallying his troops to vote for Ms. Clinton or any nominee, which he surely will for whomever is nominated.

I believe it is profoundly helpful, for Democrats and for America, that Mr. Sanders is bringing his integrity, passion, sincerity and progressive principles to center stage in the presidential campaign. It is good for Democrats and for America that new people are being inspired to join the political process which can only revitalize our democracy.

In the meantime, do not be surprised if the Iowa caucus in 2016 brings an earthquake to American politics and Bernie Sanders wins one of the great upset victories in modern times.

Poll: Sanders Gains on Clinton in New Hampshire // Real Clear Politics // Matthew Disler – June 15, 2015

The Morning Consult survey released Sunday shows the Vermont senator with 32 percent support among likely Democratic voters, compared with 44 percent for Clinton. This result should offer encouragement to the independent senator from Vermont (who is running as a Democrat) – but only in his neighboring state. Consult polls conducted in other early voting states show Sanders lagging much farther behind: He trails Clinton by 42 percentage points in Iowa and by 46 points in South Carolina. In the Palmetto State, in fact, Vice President Joe Biden is the second-place finisher, 41 points behind the frontrunner. (In Iowa, “Don’t Know” comes in second with 20 percent of responses; Sanders is third with 12 percent.)

In New Hampshire, however, Sanders’ 32 percent support has him well ahead of Biden (8 percent), former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley (2 percent) and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb (1 percent), according to the Consult. Notably, however, Biden is not in third place, as that distinction goes to “Don’t Know” at 11 percent.

Only Clinton, Sanders and O’Malley have declared their candidacy, along with former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee, who failed to register in the Iowa and New Hampshire polls, and drew 1 percent in South Carolina.

Sanders has been gaining on Clinton elsewhere. Last week, he placed a relatively close second in the Wisconsin Democratic Party’s presidential straw poll, winning 41 percent of the 551 delegates’ votes to Clinton’s 49 percent.

In the RealClearPolitics average for New Hampshire, Sanders trails Clinton by 28.5 percentage points.

Nationally, the RCP average has Clinton in front with a whopping 59 percent of support to Sanders’ 11.5 percent, Biden’s 11.3 percent, O’Malley’s 2.3 percent, Webb’s 1.5 percent and Chafee at 0.8 percent.

The Morning Consult survey, conducted May 31-June 8 online and by phone, has a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points in Iowa, South Carolina, and New Hampshire individually and six percentage points when all three polls are lumped together. The Iowa poll surveyed 905 registered voters, 313 of whom said that they intended to vote in the Democratic caucuses; in New Hampshire, the group polled 816 registered voters, 279 of whom planned to vote in that state’s Democratic primary; and in South Carolina, 906 register voters were polled, including 309 who planned to vote in the Democratic primary.

Sanders: I won’t wage personal attacks on Hillary Clinton // MSNBC // John O’Brien – June 15, 2015

Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders drew contrasts between himself and Hillary Clinton ahead of the former secretary of state’s official campaign kick off over the weekend.

On msnbc Friday, Sanders spoke with Andrea Mitchell on the main focuses of his campaign. “People are deeply concerned about the disappearing middle class, wealth and income inequality, the fact that their young kids can’t afford to go to college,” Sanders said. “Those are the issues that we are talking about.”
He added that there was a “need to transform our economics and politics so that millionaires and billionaires can’t buy elections.” His biggest difference from Hillary Clinton? Sanders points out that he does not have a super PAC and won’t be soliciting donations from wealthy campaign contributors.

Instead, Sanders said that average Americans make up the backbone of his campaign donors. “Working families all over this country are saying, Bernie, we want to stand with you,” he said. Sanders’ website even boasts that it is “paid for by Bernie 2016, not the billionaires.”

Sanders has also made clear that he will run a positive campaign focused on the issues. “I’ve known Hillary for 25 years. I am not going to be waging personal attacks against her. We differ on issues, and those are the areas that I’ll be focusing on,” Sanders said.

Why Bernie Sanders wins the crowds // CNN // Julian Zelizer – June 15, 2015

Bernie Sanders is drawing some large and enthusiastic crowds.

In New Hampshire at the Keene Recreation Center, which can hold more than 750 people, the place was packed to capacity with an overflowing crowd outside eager to hear him speak. This comes as a surprise. After all, Sanders has been a Democratic socialist for much of his political career. It would seem he is too far left on the political spectrum to be taken seriously.

The senator from Vermont is gaining attention among candidates and the press. Although some observers have explained the Sanders phenomenon as a product of Democratic politics shifting to the left, the truth is that much of what he has to say resonates with a broad spectrum of middle-class voters. Even if some of his solutions are far too much government for a broad portion of the electorate, what he's saying about American politics is resonating with voters.

A brief look at Sanders' stump speeches quickly reveals the senator is not always as "radical" as many people believe him to be. In many ways, he is as American as apple pie.

One of the biggest issues that helped Sanders gain traction is his passion for revitalizing the middle class.

Many voters in blue and red states are scared about the "new normal" of sluggish economic growth. They see their grown children struggling to obtain economic security. Polls indicate that people in both parties are greatly concerned about the expanding divide between the rich and poor.

While most Democrats still dance around this issue, fearful that their opponents will tag them as "too liberal" if they call on government to do something, Sanders tackles the issue directly. "In my view, the issue of wealth and income inequality is the great moral issue of our time; it is the great economic issue of our time, and it is the great political issue of our time," he said.

Unlike many candidates on the campaign trail, Sanders understands that these economic problems are directly related to the problems with the political process; namely, the power of private money in elections.

Economic inequality is not inevitable, in his mind. Polls show Americans are greatly concerned about the damaging reverberations of the Supreme Court's Citizens United case, which opened the floodgates to private money in campaigns. Sanders is unabashedly a critic of super PACs, large donations, and exorbitant campaign expenses. If it were up to him, the senator would revitalize the Watergate-era campaign finance reforms and go even further. He taps into deep discontent when he tells voters, "Enough is enough. This great nation and its government belong to all of the people, and not to a handful of billionaires, their super PACs and their lobbyists."

And, in an age when so many politicians seem to be scripted and elected officials willing to say anything to do better in the polls, Sanders actually believes in something.

Sanders believes in government.

When confronted with the major problems of the day, Sanders insists that government has historically done a pretty good job with issues like employment and infrastructure. He has no problem saying that the government can do a great job.

With many political advisers thinking about more "triangulation," Sanders harkens back to the accomplishments of the New Deal and Great Society. "If we are truly serious about reversing the decline of the middle class," Sanders said, "we need a major federal jobs program which puts millions of Americans back to work at decent paying jobs. At a time when our roads, bridges, water systems, rail and airports are decaying, the most effective way to rapidly create meaningful jobs is to rebuild our crumbling infrastructure."

His speeches are littered with examples of programs that have been effective. While most Republicans and a large number of independents and Democrats won't agree with his conclusions, there is something inescapably appealing about a candidate who stands for something with such clarity and verve.

Will he win? Probably not. Hillary Clinton will embrace many of these themes and speak more vocally about these issues, though probably with more hesitation and equivocation than Sanders. Clinton has launched a strong campaign, and with the possibility of electing the first female president, there's optimism and excitement in the air.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Sanders' arguments will continue to resonate with middle-class voters and his speeches will put immense pressure on Clinton and other Democrats. Even if Sanders is too far left, candidates in both parties should listen to what he is saying and learn about some of the concerns that are shaping the electorate.

Bernie Sanders says a black male baby born today has 1-in-3 chance of prison // Politifact // Louis Jacobson – June 15, 2015

Several 2016 presidential candidates in both parties have discussed how the criminal justice system might be improved. The latest to address this issue was Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders during a June 11, 2015, interview on PBS.
"A black male baby born today, if we do not change the system, stands a one-in-three chance (of) ending up in jail. This is (an) unspeakable tragedy."

When we took a closer look, we found that the statistic may not be far off -- but it's hard to know for sure, because the data Sanders relies on is so old. As with other dramatic talking points we've seen over the years, this one has been repeated and repeated over a decade and a half without being updated, despite evidence that the underlying trends have changed direction.

The statistic dates back to a 2003 paper published by the Bureau of Justice Statistics, a division of the U.S. Justice Department. The Bureau of Justice Statistics paper includes the line, "About 1 in 3 black males ... are expected to go to prison during their lifetime, if current incarceration rates remain unchanged."

By contrast, the paper said, one of every six Hispanic males and one of every 17 white males can be expected to go to prison during their lifetime. (For this fact-check, we'll ignore Sanders' imprecise use of "jail," where people are held temporarily, rather than "prison," where inmates are typically serving substantial sentences.)

Not only was this data published 12 years ago, but the paper is based on data from 2001 -- a full 14 years ago. Despite its age, the statistic has been cited repeatedly -- notably in 2013 with the publication of a report by the Sentencing Project, a group that advocates for prison reform and promotes alternatives to incarceration. That report's claim -- that "if current trends continue, one of every three black American males born today can expect to go to prison in his lifetime" -- was footnoted to a 2011 paper by Marc Mauer, the Sentencing Project's executive director.

When we contacted Mauer, he said he doesn't know of any updated research that would shed light on the percentage today. "It's a very complex analysis to produce, so that's at least part of the reason that it hasn't been replicated in recent years," Mauer said.
We did, however, find reason to believe that the trend line that had been assumed in the 2003 paper has changed course.

According to annual Justice Department reports, in 2001 there were 3,535 sentenced black male prisoners under state or federal jurisdiction for every 100,000 black male residents. By 2013, the equivalent number was 2,805. So black incarceration rates were 21 percent lower in 2013 than they were in 2001.

That said, there's little doubt that black men have disproportionately higher incarceration rates. For instance, a study published in the journal Crime & Delinquency found that nearly half of black males and almost 40 percent of white males in the United States have been arrested by the age of 23.

But because of the complexities of modeling the statistics, Mauer said, it's hard to know how much the decline in incarceration rates would specifically change the one-in-three statistic Sanders used.

"We can't necessarily say that the one-in-three figure should be reduced by 21 percent, although if we did, it would bring it down to about 1 in 4, which is still quite dramatic," Mauer said.

Our ruling

Sanders said that "a black male baby born today, if we do not change the system, stands a one-in-three chance (of) ending up in jail."

This calculation, while it's the most recent one available, is 14 years old, and changes in the underlying data suggest that the actual odds of incarceration may be somewhat smaller today. Still, other evidence suggests that blacks have a disproportionate likelihood of ending up in prison. On balance we rate it Mostly True.

Jim Webb to decide on presidential campaign in next two weeks // WaPo // Rachel Weiner – June

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

15, 2015

As Jeb Bush announces the launch of a presidential campaign that has been all but official for months, Jim Webb is still openly wrestling with whether or not to run in the Democratic primary next year.

"We're going to make a decision within the next two weeks," the former Virginia senator told an Iowa radio host Monday morning. "The decision point is — can we put together a viable campaign without having to fall into this financial campaign funding process which I think is damaging to the country?"

Webb is back in Iowa on Monday and Tuesday, touring a wind farm and holding events around the Des Moines area.

Since launching an exploratory committee last fall with a low-budget Web video, Webb has acknowledged that he might not be able to raise the funds to compete on the national stage. He has been dipping in and out of early states while retreating from the trail for long stretches. He has gone through two Iowa operatives since he began considering a bid.

But he told Des Moines' WHO Radio that the huge audience that turned out to see Vermont's independent Sen. Bernie Sanders in Iowa this past weekend was a sign that some Democratic voters were "uneasy" with their choices and "looking for a different form of leadership."

Unlike Sanders, who this weekend went after Hillary Rodham Clinton for avoiding a clear position on a major free trade deal with Asia, Webb has avoided directly criticizing the former secretary of state. However, he agrees with Sanders and fellow Clinton opponent Martin O'Malley that the plan should not be fast-tracked through Congress.

"We need to see in writing what it is that the country is supposed to be approving," he said of the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Labor buys 'thank you' ads for lawmakers who blocked Obama trade pact // WaPo // David Nakamura – June 15, 2015

The AFL-CIO is thanking Democratic lawmakers who stood with organized labor and blocked President Obama's trade deal in the House last week.

The ads, featuring individual members, will run on Facebook, and in print in the members' district. The labor union also is purchasing mobile ads in The Hill, a Capitol Hill publication.

"Thank you for standing with working families," the ads state, featuring photos of the lawmakers.

Labor has waged a fierce battle to block Congress from granting Obama fast-track powers to speed up completion of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a 12-nation free trade and regulatory deal. The AFL-CIO has said past trade deals have resulted in lost jobs and declining wages for workers in traditional manufacturing jobs.

The vast majority of House Democrats — 144 of 188 — voted Friday against a bill to offer financial assistance and job retraining for workers displaced by global trade. Though Democrats generally support such aid, the lawmakers voted against it to block a related bill to fast-track the TPP. Both bills were required to pass for the package to move forward, and it remains stalled in the House.

The Obama administration and Republican leaders have vowed to try again on the trade package as soon as this week.

Immigration 2016: Dems Try to out-DACA Each Other, While Mitt Admitting Mistake Gives GOP 'Chance to Win' // PJ Media // Bridget Johnson – June 15, 2015

If Hillary Clinton's opponents for the Democratic presidential nomination were chasing her on trade yesterday, today they're getting out front on immigration.

Today is the third anniversary of the announcement of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program that has given legal work status to 700,000 illegal immigrants.

"If it weren't for DREAMers, their voices and efforts, DACAmented youth around the country wouldn't be able to contribute their skills, work and ingenuity to the country they call home," former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley said in English and Spanish statements today. "These are the young New Americans who are doing what so many of our ancestors have done before them: making our nation stronger with their passion, their talent, and their love of country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I've had the honor of working side by side many of these New Americans. I am proud of what we fought for together – passing the DREAM Act in Maryland and making sure that all New Americans regardless of their status could drive lawfully and safely in our communities."

However, he said, "DACA is just a temporary solution, and it is a moral and economic imperative that we make sure DREAMers and other New Americans can fully contribute to our country."

"I know the urgency to fix our broken immigration system," O'Malley said. "I'm the only candidate in this race who has committed to tackle immigration reform in my first 100 days in office and the only one with a proven record of advancing New American rights."

Last month, Clinton hired a DREAMer activist as her campaign's Latino outreach director.

Campaigning in Nevada in early May with DREAMers — illegal immigrants brought to the country as children, named so for the DREAM Act — Hillary Clinton vowed "to stop partisan attacks on the executive actions that would put DREAMers – including many with us today – at risk of deportation."

"And, if Congress refuses to act, as president I will do everything possible under the law to go even further. There are more people – like many parents of DREAMers and others with deep ties and contributions to our communities – who deserve a chance to stay. I'll fight for them too," she added.

Clinton's campaign released a fact sheet on her plans for comprehensive immigration reform, stressing that anything from Congress "must include nothing less than a full and equal path to citizenship."

But the Dems aren't the only one staking out their claims on immigration.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), vying for the Republican nomination, told CBS on Sunday that "Mitt Romney and Ann Romney did our party a great service by admitting that embracing self-deportation in 2012 was their biggest mistake."

"They have given us a chance in 2016 to win," Graham said. "You're not going to self-deport 11 million people. You're not going to be able to do that. I'm not going to be a Republican nominee wanting to try to do that. If you pass a criminal background check, I will allow to you stay here legally and earn your way to citizenship. It will be hard-earned pathway. But I hope every candidate on the Republican side will follow Mitt Romney's lead and admit it was a mistake to embrace self-deportation. And I hope self-deportation is in our rear-view mirror as a party, because if it is not, we will lose in 2016."

"...There are some people saying we need to limit legal immigration. To me, they're just looking in a different world than I am. We will be down to two workers for every retiree in the next 20 years. We're going to need more legal immigration. And I hope we will embrace a comprehensive approach that is realistic and humane."

BUSH

Jeb Bush's Surprising Struggle With Moderates // NYT // Nate Cohn – June 15, 2015

It was easy to see Jeb Bush's path to the Republican nomination when he announced the formation of his super PAC in December. He wasn't guaranteed to pull it off — not by any stretch — but he seemed well positioned to appeal to the coalition of party elites and blue-state voters that has allowed center-right establishment candidates to win the party's last two contests.

Mr. Bush might still take exactly this path to the nomination. But the striking — and surprising — thing about his candidacy is that he will formally enter the race Monday bearing many of the costs of the center-right approach without seeming to enjoy many of the benefits.

He has not won the invisible primary, the behind-the-scenes competition for elite support that often decides the nomination, and he has not even emerged as a favorite of the party's large block of more moderate voters. He starts in a weaker position than not only his brother in 1999 or his father in 1987, but also Mitt Romney in 2011.

To a certain extent, Mr. Bush is a victim of unfair expectations. He was often called the front-runner, even though it was obvious that the party's large conservative and populist base would have serious reservations about an establishment candidate who often seemed to attack conservatives. And he was likely to face stronger competition, like Scott Walker, than recent Republican nominees.

What is surprising, though, is Mr. Bush's relatively vulnerable standing in the places he had seemed strong only a few months ago. It's no surprise that he has miserable numbers among Iowa caucus-goers, who are very conservative, and Tea Party supporters nationwide. It is surprising that he has not emerged as a clear favorite in New Hampshire, where self-identified moderates make up nearly half of the electorate. In national polls, he fares no better against Hillary Rodham Clinton than Marco Rubio or Mr. Walker, and his favorability ratings are worse than all of them. The party establishment hasn't unified around him, perhaps in part as a result of these indicators.

Mr. Bush's struggle is a reflection of his own missteps and weaknesses, like a handful of stumbles on the campaign trail and his unpopular last name. But it is also a reflection of the strength of his competition — not just from the mainstream candidates who can take a slice of the relatively moderate voters and elites he requires to be viable, but also from the conservative candidates he ultimately needs to defeat.

The early signs of Mr. Bush's strength — like prominent hires, reports of prodigious fund-raising, Mitt Romney's decision to stay out of the race, and reports that similarly positioned candidates were struggling to find breathing room — have all faded. Some are no longer true.

Mr. Romney's exit now looks like the exception, with a flood of candidates joining the race. Most significant is Mr. Rubio, the senator who many believed would not run if Mr. Bush, his mentor, entered the race.

Mr. Rubio, 44, may offer the field's best case for "electability" because of his youth, charisma and Cuban heritage, and he is competing for many of the same supporters as Mr. Bush, including in their home state of Florida. A stronger Mr. Bush would have made it very difficult for Mr. Rubio to win the nomination, but Mr. Bush's weakness has created an opening for Mr. Rubio that didn't even seem to be there as recently as two or three months ago.

John Kasich, the governor of Ohio, also seemed unlikely to run until a few months ago. Like Mr. Rubio, and along with Chris Christie and Lindsey Graham, he could draw at least some supporters and voters from Mr. Bush. "I didn't think I was going to be back up here again because, frankly, I thought Jeb was just going to suck all the air out of the room," Mr. Kasich said two weeks ago in New Hampshire, "and it just hasn't happened."

Mr. Bush's fund-raising, with a goal of $100 million for his super PAC, is impressive. But it's hard to say just how impressive it really is in an era of unlimited contributions, when even a candidate like Ted Cruz can raise more than $30 million for his super PAC in a few weeks. And in recent days, there have been reports that Mr. Bush might fall well short of early fund-raising expectations — a further sign of weakness.

Even if his fund-raising is as strong as he hoped, there is no reason to expect it will be decisive: Mr. Romney barely won pivotal states like Ohio and Michigan in the 2012 primaries, despite an overwhelming financial and organizational edge over a candidate, Rick Santorum, who was not nearly as strong as Mr. Bush's competition is today.

Perhaps most important, it's surprisingly hard to find prominent elites who support Mr. Bush — aside from a spurt of donors and high-profile aides who joined his team a few months ago and late last week. When my colleague Peter Baker recently surveyed 120 people who worked for President George W. Bush, only about 25 responded to say they supported Jeb Bush. You won't find many Republicans and conservatives praising him on television or in print. So far, Mr. Bush has received no formal endorsements from outside Florida, and nothing is a better indicator of primary strength than endorsements.
Mr. Bush, of course, might eventually generate a surge of endorsements. Fund-raising strength usually correlates with endorsements, even if a handful of candidates with unusually close ties to Wall Street and strong fund-raising performances but poor results — like Phil Gramm, chairman of the Senate committee on banking, and the former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani — have soured analysts on this metric.

But much of the Republican elite has serious reservations about whether Mr. Bush is the best candidate to face Mrs. Clinton. It's not hard to imagine why: His favorability ratings and standing against her are dismal. Whatever the actual value of public opinion polling at this early stage, the polls give no reason for elites to assume that Mr. Bush is a particularly strong general election candidate.

His performance on the campaign trail hasn't given them much reason to assume he could be a strong candidate, either. Last month, he struggled to answer a question about whether he would have invaded Iraq, given what we know today. It at once made him seem unprepared for a predictable question while highlighting the vulnerability posed by his last name. It was a very different Mr. Bush than the one depicted in initial press reports, which quoted Republican donors who insisted that he was such an impressive candidate that he could distinguish himself from his brother.

Candidates like Mr. Rubio, Mr. Walker, Mr. Kasich, Rick Perry, Mr. Christie and Rand Paul can compete for moderate and independent voters in New Hampshire, a state that Mr. Bush may need to win. On paper, one would expect that a relatively moderate Republican would fare well in New Hampshire. But Mr. Bush has struggled to take a lead there, and it's fair to wonder whether he is as good a fit for the state as one might guess from his moderate reputation.

The state's voters aren't just relatively moderate; they're independent and iconoclastic. John McCain won the state in 2000 and 2008, while Jon Huntsman and Ron Paul combined to amass more support than Mr. Romney received four years ago. One wonders whether an establishment-backed Bush is the right candidate to appeal to a state with a penchant for "mavericks."

Just as important, the field includes candidates who have the potential to consolidate conservatives without alienating the rest of the party. The inability of conservatives to get their act together has been one of the biggest assets to the establishment. In the last two Republican primaries, conservatives settled on two evangelical favorites — Mr. Santorum and Mike Huckabee — who had little chance of defeating the more mainstream front-runner in a long battle.

This year, both Mr. Walker and Mr. Rubio have the potential to consolidate conservatives and win a national campaign. Of the two, Mr. Walker has the easier path. He already holds a modest but consistent lead in Iowa polls, and, unlike recent Iowa winners, he has the broad appeal and elite support necessary to win a protracted contest. He could even win New Hampshire, especially over a divided field, something that could not be said for either of the last two winners of Iowa.

Mr. Rubio has a somewhat harder path. While Mr. Walker is a natural candidate of very conservative voters in part because of his victories over unions and liberal opponents in Wisconsin, Mr. Rubio lacks as clear a pitch to one of the party's major factions. So far, he is the second choice of many.

But Mr. Rubio offers the conservative elite a reliable representative of their views, and they believe he is well positioned to face Mrs. Clinton in the general election. He is also a charismatic enough politician to become the first choice of many if elites bestow the necessary resources, or if another candidate stumbles, and it would be unwise to rule out the possibility that he could simply outperform Mr. Bush in the minds of voters and elites alike.

Mr. Walker and Mr. Rubio could certainly falter. Well-positioned candidates have done so before, like Mr. Romney in 2008 and Mr. Perry in 2012. But if they do not, Mr. Bush will need to defeat them the old-fashioned way. He will need to perform better on the campaign trail, reassuring Republican elites and eventually swaying voters in New Hampshire.

This is not the path of an invisible primary leader, like that of his brother 16 years ago or of Mrs. Clinton today. It's a tougher one.

Jeb Bush Announces White House Bid, Saying 'America Deserves Better.' // NYT // Michael Barbaro and Jonathan Martin – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush, the son and brother of a president, offered himself up as the most accomplished leader in the 2016 field, declared war on Washington's political culture and insisted that his family name gave him no singular claim to the Oval Office as he formally entered the race for the White House on Monday.

As his mother, Barbara, the former first lady, looked on, Mr. Bush directly confronted the central doubt looming over his campaign: that he presents the latest incarnation of a tired dynasty and is entitled to the Republican nomination by virtue of his surname.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family, or family narrative," Mr. Bush said inside a community college gymnasium. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test."

In declaring his presidential bid before a cheering crowd at Miami Dade College, Mr. Bush promised to remove Washington as an obstacle to effective government and economic prosperity by declaring that "America deserves better."

Mr. Bush, whose two terms as governor of Florida were marked by the privatization of traditional state services, vowed to "take Washington – the static capital of this dynamic country – out of the business of causing problems."

Mr. Bush called upon his own record of ambitious, conservative-minded change as Florida's chief executive. "I know we can fix this," Mr. Bush said. "Because I've done it."

Mr. Bush, 62, declared his White House ambitions nearly 27 years after his father was elected president, molding a political dynasty that would propel one son into a governor's office and another into the White House.

But Mr. Bush entered a presidential contest — unruly in size, unyielding in pace and voracious in cost — that is unlike any faced by his father, George Bush, who won the office in 1988, or his brother, George W. Bush, who claimed it in 2000.

In his speech, Mr. Bush offered himself up as a counterpoint to a Republican Party that has struggled to connect with minority voters, costing it the last two presidential elections. He also vowed to remain true to his principles, an implicit attack on his Republican rivals who have changed their views to appeal to the party's conservative base.

And as the third member of his family to seek the nation's highest office, he brings to the race a last name that at once burnishes and tarnishes, evoking the nobility of public service and a deep distrust of political entitlement.

Mr. Bush's campaign highlighted that tension on Monday with the selection of a spare logo, first used in his failed 1994 race for governor, that excludes his surname. It reads simply "Jeb!" And while Mr. Bush's wife, Columba, and his three adult children attended his speech, his father and brother did not join him for the announcement at the Kendall Campus of Miami Dade College.

Mr. Bush's advisers and allies once predicted that he would emerge as the dominant Republican in the 2016 campaign, fueled by his record of conservative accomplishment as Florida's governor, his popularity at the end of his time in office and the fund-raising prowess of the Bush family network. But now they are resigned to a far longer and uglier slog for him in the Republican nominating contest.

"The operative word inside the campaign is patience," said Al Cardenas, a former Florida Republican Party leader and longtime ally of Mr. Bush. "As people get to know him, things will get better."

Mr. Bush made his formal announcement here in the multicultural city that allowed him to escape from his family's patrician roots in the ivy-covered walls of Connecticut and in the oil patches of Texas. It was Miami that eventually nurtured the political ambitions that had long been a birthright of his clan.

In his speech, he both embraced elements of his heritage and tried to transcend them, portraying himself as an entrepreneurial figure who, in the Bush family way, struck out on his own, built up a real estate business and became a governor who delivered on a promise of sweeping change.

"I said I was going to do these things, and I did them," Mr. Bush declared in a video released by his political operation on Sunday night. "The result was Florida's a lot better off."

Joining a field crowded with governors and senators, he tried on Monday to distinguish himself as an executive animated by big ideas and uniquely capable of carrying them out, pointing to his record in Florida of introducing a taxpayer-financed school voucher program, expanding charter schools, reducing the size of state government by thousands of workers and cutting taxes by billions.

Above all, he offered himself as a messenger of optimistic conservatism, uninterested in the politics of grievance, obstructionism and partisanship that, in his eyes and those of his allies, have catapulted less accomplished rivals, like Senators Ted Cruz of Texas and Rand Paul of Kentucky, to national prominence.

Leadership, he says in the video, is "not just about yapping about things," an unmistakable attack on his voluble, less seasoned rivals from the Senate.

He adds: "There's a lot of people talking. And they're pretty good at it. But we need to start fixing things."

The risk for Mr. Bush, a cerebral figure who seems more at ease debating the intricacies of education policy with business leaders than electrifying a crowd of voters, is that the charismatic talkers in his party may outshine him before ballots are cast. He has yet to emerge as a front-runner in polls, lagging rivals in crucial states like Iowa, which will hold its caucuses early next year.

Mr. Cardenas said Monday's speech was only the beginning of a long sales pitch that Mr. Bush must make in states with early nominating contests like Iowa and New Hampshire.

"I consider the early states an asset for most candidates who are introducing themselves, and a burden for Governor Bush," Mr. Cardenas said.

"The reason for that is that since 2006, many of our pundits in the party have not been kind to the Bush family," Mr. Cardenas said.

Many Republican elected officials who admire Mr. Bush have nevertheless held back from endorsing him, saying he still needs to prove himself as a candidate.

Jeb Bradley, the majority leader in the New Hampshire State Senate, said that Mr. Bush met his three criteria for an endorsement — leadership skills, appealing stances on most issues and ability to win — but that he was still open to backing two other Republicans, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin.

“I want to see what Governor Bush says in Monday’s speech, see him at a town-hall meeting up here, see what his fund-raising looks like,” Mr. Bradley said.

The announcement of Mr. Bush’s White House run ends an unusual, legally problematic and occasionally comical phase in which Mr. Bush traveled, raised money and campaigned as a full-fledged candidate but insisted, despite all evidence to the contrary, that he was not officially exploring a presidential run.

It was a claim that allowed Mr. Bush to collect vast sums of cash for the political entities that could supercharge his campaign, but it produced several moments of semantic gymnastics. (A few days ago, to the barely suppressed laughter of the reporters nearby, Mr. Bush referred to “election night” and the “campaign that is likely to take place.”)

Despite Mr. Bush’s stumbles so far, his friends and allies said his biggest asset was his unwillingness to transform himself into something he is not.

“I think he needs to put aside the last few months and continue to calmly show a grown-up attitude,” said Barry Wynn, a prominent South Carolina Republican and donor. “The two things that will distinguish him are his stature, that he is a grown-up ready for the presidency, and his consistency, that he’s not changing to make everyone happy.”

“The worst thing for Jeb to do,” Mr. Wynn said, “is give his opponents any opportunity to close the stature gap he enjoys.”

But it remains unclear whether conservative-leaning voters will be as animated by Mr. Bush’s “grown-up” qualities as the party’s donor class, which has formed his core of early support.

“I am going to be who I am,” he said in Europe last weekend, on a trip during which he barely interacted with ordinary people. He seemed content mostly to bat around policy ideas, as he did on Saturday in Estonia with a group of technology executives who briefed him on the digitalization of the country’s government.

“I’m not going to change who I am,” Mr. Bush said as he left the meeting, his last in Europe, and headed home.

Jeb Bush on the Issues // NYT // Gerry Mullany – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush, who was governor of Florida from 1999 to 2007, on Monday announced his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination. A son of George Bush, the 41st president, and a younger brother of George W. Bush, the 43rd, he is known for sometimes bucking Republican orthodoxy. Here is a look at his stand on important issues.

Foreign Policy

Mr. Bush says that American combat forces should not be sent to Iraq to fight the group calling itself the Islamic State, but that some troops should be embedded with Iraqi forces there “to help train them, to identify targets.” He has called the Obama administration’s framework of an agreement with Iran to curb its nuclear program a “horrific deal” and, like fellow Republican contenders, said he would most likely cancel any final agreement reached by the administration should he become president. Mr. Bush calls himself “an unwavering supporter” of Israel and its prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, and distanced himself from recent comments by an adviser, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, that were critical of Mr. Netanyahu. Mr. Bush opposes normalizing relations with Cuba; in early December, before President Obama moved to do so, Mr. Bush said that “instead of lifting the embargo, we should consider strengthening it.”

Immigration

Mr. Bush says he believes that people who are in this country illegally should be offered a path to legal status. “You pay your fines, you get provisional work permits, where you come out of the shadows, you pay taxes, you pay fines, you don’t receive government assistance, you learn English, you don’t commit crimes,” he said in February. “Any of those things that you do would be a deportable offense.” He also called, as many Republican candidates have, for tougher enforcement of immigration laws, including prosecuting businesses that hire undocumented aliens.

Same-Sex Marriage

Signaling his opposition to same-sex marriage, Mr. Bush says he believes in “traditional marriage.” But he has also suggested an openness to some form of recognition of same-sex unions. “I hope that we can show respect for the good people on all sides of the gay and lesbian marriage issue," he said in January, "including couples making lifetime commitments to each other who are seeking greater legal protections and those of us who believe marriage is a sacrament and want to safeguard religious liberty."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Environment

"The climate is changing, and I'm concerned about that," Mr. Bush said in New Hampshire in April, adding that "we need to work with the rest of the world to negotiate a way to reduce carbon emissions." Those remarks distinguished him from most other Republican presidential hopefuls, who deny that the climate is changing or that global warming is caused by human behavior. But Mr. Bush also said he was more concerned about protecting the economy, warning of "the hollowing out of our industrial core, the hollowing out of our ability to compete in an increasingly competitive world."

Education

Mr. Bush has been an outspoken defender of the Common Core national educational standards, which were intended to raise proficiency in math and English but have generated a strong backlash among conservatives who see Common Core as an overreach by the federal government. "Raising expectations and having accurate assessments of where kids are is essential for success," Mr. Bush said in defending the standards.

Economy and Budget

While focusing his economic message on inequality and middle-class wage stagnation, Mr. Bush has not yet offered detailed proposals to confront these issues. He has said he would try to nearly double the nation's annual growth rate to 4 percent to create jobs. Though he favors simplifying the tax code, he has not specified how he would change the federal tax system. As governor, though, he signed several tax cuts into law, including a cut and then a repeal of Florida's 0.2 percent tax on stocks, bonds and other so-called intangible assets.

Jeb Bush Shows Loyalty to a Logo Derided by Some // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush's new campaign logo — Jeb! — was unveiled to guffaws that it was unoriginal and lacking in design elements, but for the former Florida governor, a throwback look appears to have been part of the plan.

Mr. Bush's logo dates to his 1994 campaign, when he lost to Lawton Chiles, the incumbent Democratic governor. He stuck with it over the years, and in 2002 filed paperwork to trademark the logo.

The move was considered unorthodox at the time. According to a report from The Miami Herald, Mr. Bush intended to prevent groups that opposed him from using his name to raise money.

Mr. Bush remained protective of the trademark over the years. In 2010, after he had left office, his lawyer accused a Democratic State Senate candidate, Deborah Gianoulis, of stealing his logo after she distributed campaign signs and bumper stickers that read "Deb!"

After receiving a cease-and-desist letter, Ms. Gianoulis told The Florida Times-Union she had no idea about Mr. Bush's logo and said "Deb" was her nickname.

"Governor Bush is welcome to borrow the logo we used in my 2010 campaign," Ms. Gianoulis said on Monday. "All I ask in return is that his campaign put an exclamation point behind support for public education."

Mr. Bush's trademark lapsed later in 2010, and he reapplied for it this year, according to filings with the United States Patent and Trademark Office.

Branding experts noted on Monday that Mr. Bush's simple, first-name only logo works well with his 2016 bid, in which he is looking to play down his connection to a political dynasty.

Erick Erickson, the conservative blogger, suggested that Mr. Bush's logo is no worse than Hillary Rodham Clinton's "H" with an arrow and argued that it would be hard to trump the success that President Obama had with "O" and a swooshing flag.

"At least 'Jeb!' is consistent and carries some history with it," Mr. Erickson said. "Unfortunately for Jeb Bush, so does his last name."

Jeb Bush Is Still the Favorite, the Markets Say // NYT // David Leonhardt – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush has had a rough few months. He fumbled a question about the war in Iraq. He has not consolidated the support of Republican elites, as Nate Cohn notes. And he has not scared off other candidates who could hurt him in the primaries, like John Kasich. There is no clever case to be made that Mr. Bush's campaign has actually performed well this spring.

But if we've learned one thing about presidential campaigns, it's that most people who follow them overreact to short-term news. Ronald Reagan's 1980 campaign had its share of gaffes. Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign lurched from one crisis to the next. George W. Bush endured a drunk-driving revelation in the final days of his 2000 campaign. Barack Obama seemed to dismiss guns and religion as opiates of the masses. All survived to win not only those campaigns but also re-election four years later.

PredictWise gives him roughly a 31 percent chance of winning the Republican nomination, a number that has changed little in 2015. It was as low as 27 percent in January and briefly touched 36 percent a couple of times in early April. He remains the favorite, with Marco Rubio at 25 percent, Scott Walker at 18 percent and no other individual candidate above 5 percent (Rand Paul's chances have generally been rated higher in the last few months, but he is at 5 percent as of today).

Mr. Bush's basic strengths and weaknesses have not changed. He is the most experienced, tested candidate among the Republicans' major contenders, with deep ties to party leaders, a popular tenure as Florida's governor and a well-known interest in policy. He is also a mediocre speech-giver, the brother of a president who was among the least popular of the last 80 years, and a person who's distrusted by many conservatives.

I might quibble with the collective opinion of the prediction markets. (I believe they're still overestimating the chances that the nominee will be someone other than Mr. Bush, Mr. Rubio or Mr. Walker.) But the notion that Mr. Bush's chances are only slightly worse than they were at the peak feels right, for all the negative commentary he is now receiving.

He is both the most likely Republican nominee — and still more likely than not to lose the nomination. The campaign has a long way to go.

Jeb Bush repackages his brother's 'compassionate conservatism' // WaPo // Paul Waldman – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush will be announcing his presidential candidacy this afternoon, finally ending all the edge-of-your-seat mystery and speculation about whether he really is running. And from what we've learned in advance, Bush may be charting an interesting and somewhat risky path to get his party's nomination.

Instead of doing what we might have expected from someone in Jeb's position — bending over backward to convince base Republicans that he's a true conservative — he seems to be going in the opposite direction. It's almost as if he's already running a general election campaign.

We won't know all the details until he gives the speech, and I'm sure there will be a reasonable amount of massaging of the conservative pleasure centers on things like tax cuts and reducing regulation. But Jeb's first notes as an official candidate sound a lot like his brother's "compassionate conservatism."

Let's be clear about what that means. "Compassionate conservatism" was always light on policy and heavy on image-making. While it's fashionable for Republicans to now say that George W. Bush wasn't a "real" conservative because he didn't cut spending enough, the truth is that he gave conservatives almost everything they wanted: huge tax cuts for the wealthy, slashing regulations, a belligerent foreign policy, right-wing judges, and so on. But he also said nice things about poor people and spent lots of time posing for pictures with African-Americans and Hispanics — hence, "compassion." His 2004 campaign web site featured a "Compassion Photo Album" that was, I kid you not, just a bunch of photos of George and Laura with black and Hispanic people.

And Jeb is following in those footsteps. Check out this video the campaign just released:

In this video, the four people offering testimonials on Bush's behalf are an Hispanic immigrant man, the family member of a person with disabilities (also Hispanic), a woman who had been the victim of domestic violence, and a young African-American woman who was the first in her family to graduate college. Only one of them, the African-American woman, is associated with a conservative policy, school vouchers. In the other cases we have no idea what the actual policies were that helped these people, only that they are grateful to Jeb Bush. At the end, he says, "What we need is new leadership that takes conservative principles and applies them so that people can rise up," but other than that one mention of the word "conservative," you might not even be sure this is a Republican candidate.

Needless to say, this is a stark contrast to the way his opponents are running; the question most of them are trying to answer is how they can show primary voters that they're the most conservative candidate in the bunch. It's also a striking departure from the strategy employed four years ago by Mitt Romney, who had a profile similar in many ways to Bush's, and who like Bush had to win over skeptical conservatives.

At the time, Romney went on a national self-flagellation tour, renouncing his prior beliefs and begging for forgiveness for his past heresies. But Bush now looks like someone who's already trying to appeal to the general electorate. In another video released today, Bush has a litany of Americans he sees who are "ready" to get on board his train to the future ("children who are ready to learn, entrepreneurs who are ready to innovate," etc), and one of the groups he cites are "immigrants who are ready to contribute." You aren't going to hear that from Scott Walker.

To be clear, this doesn't mean Jeb Bush is some kind of moderate — he isn't, and he isn't going be claiming to be so in any explicit way. Saying that clearly would be going too far for the primary electorate (prominent conservative media figures like Rush Limbaugh, Glenn Beck, Mark Levin, and Laura Ingraham are already lining up against him because he supposedly isn't conservative enough). The differences between him and the other candidates on policy are tiny, where they exist at all.

But the Bush campaign says he'll be "showing his heart," which appears to mean talking to the kind of people his party has spent the last few years trying as hard as they could to alienate. It sounds like someone who's already looking past the primaries to the general election.

For Jeb Bush, a moment to refocus // WaPo // Dan Balz – June 15, 2015

Campaign kickoffs aren't what they once were, given the distractions of the time and speed with which one political event overtakes another. But for Jeb Bush, Monday's launch couldn't have come at a more opportune time.

For the past week, much of the media's attention on Bush has focused on the internal machinations of his staff and political operation. Monday's announcement provided Bush with a welcome circuit breaker, and he took full advantage of the moment.

His speech, delivered to an energized audience at Miami Dade College, was peppered with criticism of President Obama, Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton, the progressive establishment and the lobbyist-dominated culture of Washington.

It was both personal and thematic, short on policy details but not on offering a roadmap to the kind of campaign he will run and the kind of president he would like to be. It was an opportunity for Bush to refocus attention on himself — and it was a call to Republicans to look more fully at who he is and isn't and at what he has to offer.

In his telling, what makes him stand out in a crowded field is a combination of executive experience as a governor, conservative values, a compassionate heart, a commitment to small government with what he described as the instincts of a reformer prepared to disrupt the "pampered elites" in the nation's capital.

Implicit in his message, and explicit in the words of some of the speakers who preceded him on the stage at Miami Dade College, was one more thing that he and his team believe sets him apart. That is the claim that he would be better positioned to win a general election and restore Republicans to the White House than any of his rivals.

That is, if he can defeat those rivals to win the GOP nomination. That is the central question surrounding his candidacy. He carries a famous name and would make history by becoming the third member of one family to be elected president.

On Monday, Bush made a special point of debunking any suggestion that he believes he has a head start or should be seen as anything approaching a front-runner or favorite for the nomination.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of résumé, party, seniority, family, or family narrative," he said. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test, and it's wide open — exactly as a contest for president should be."

Bush's formal announcement ended six months of an exhibition season that did as much to underscore the obstacles ahead of him in his quest to win the White House as they did to highlight the reality that he will still have certain advantages in the months ahead.

He may not be the dominant GOP candidate that some people mistakenly thought anyone with the Bush name and network should be. But neither is anyone named Bush merely one more candidate in a crowded field of contenders, regardless of what the polls show.

Those polls show a compacted field, bunched at the top and with many others close behind. But Bush still has assets that could give him the staying power to win what shapes up as an extremely competitive contest.

One is money. When he finally reports on the results of his tireless, aggressive fundraising of the first months of this year, it is likely to outdistance his rivals, perhaps by significant millions. If a Bush-allied super PAC falls short of the $100 million threshold that has been talked about, it nonetheless is likely to get people's attention, particularly his rivals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush also knows what he thinks about issues and is comfortable talking about them — whether domestic issues that were his bread and butter in Tallahassee during his two terms as governor or some national security issues that are newer but not exactly foreign to him. That is an asset not to be underestimated over the course of a long and rigorous campaign.

He faces resistance inside his party — hesitation born of a belief among some Republicans that no matter what they might think of the presidencies of his father, George H.W. Bush, or his brother, George W. Bush, a third Bush presidency is simply one too many.

He faces resistance from other Republicans who doubt his authenticity as a conservative. His advisers say he will try to appeal to every segment of the party, and they believe he has something for each of them.

There were hints of that Monday, from talk of his fiscal conservatism to mentions of religious freedom and battles between Christian conservatives and the Obama administration to tough talk to appeal to national security hawks.

But it is Bush's differences with party orthodoxy that could disrupt his campaign for the nomination. He differs with others in his party on the issue of Common Core, though not on education reform more generally. He talked about taking on the education unions Monday but did not mention Common Core, other than to say the federal government should not be in charge of school curriculum standards.

He also parts company with most of his rivals on immigration. He supports a path to legal status for those here illegally, but opposes a path to citizenship, as Obama, Clinton and most Democrats favor.

His prepared text made no mention of immigration, but he could not hide from it. Two-thirds of the way through the speech, a group of young people stood up in the balcony with T-shirts that spelled out, "Legal status is not enough." In response Bush said that the next president would enact immigration reform.

Bush pledged an optimistic campaign and said he would run everywhere, "speaking to everyone, keeping my word, facing the issues without flinching, and staying true to what I believe. I will take nothing and no one for granted. I will run with heart and I will run to win."

He has no other choice. What the past months have shown is that he will face one of the most competitive contests Republicans have seen in many campaigns. He has filled his campaign coffers and realigned his staff for the battles ahead. Now it comes back to him. Can he make the sale to a wary party?

Meet the people who will try to get Jeb Bush elected president // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush launches his presidential campaign on Monday surrounded by a family all-too familiar with the strains and triumphs of presidential politics, a handful of friends and confidants who have known him for decades and younger recruits fluent in the mechanics of modern political warfare.

The former Florida governor also boasts an unrivaled donor network -- cultivated from his Miami home base and by his extended family for more than 40 years -- and a campaign team growing across the country. There's also a super PAC, run by Bush's political alter ego, that is poised to raise record sums of money.

Out on the campaign trail and behind the scenes, here's a list of people advising and supporting Bush, compiled by The Washington Post and subject to change as we learn more:

FAMILY AND FRIENDS:
Jeb Bush speaks to supporters as his wife, Columba Bush, and youngest son, Jeb Bush Jr., stand on stage with him during a fundraising event at the Jorge Mas Canosa Youth Center in Sweetwater, Fla., on March 18. (Joe Raedle/ Getty Images)
Columba Bush: The candidate's wife; they've been married for 41 years. The couple first met in her home town of Leon, Mexico, when he visited on a high school exchange trip. After marriage, they lived in Venezuela, where he worked as a bank executive, and the family moved two years later to Miami. They speak Spanish to one another and their lives have been immersed in Hispanic culture.

On the campaign trail, Bush frequently mentions the two distinct periods in his life: "B.C. and A.C.: Before Columba and After Columba."

"I love her dearly, and she has given me a purpose in my life that makes me kind of a grinder, if you will," he once said.

George P. Bush: The eldest of Bush's children and the oldest member of the family's next generation. He has two young sons with his wife, Amanda. Bush did a tour in Afghanistan with the Navy Reserve and now serves as Texas

Land Commissioner, easily winning election last year. He will travel to Nevada this week to campaign on his father's behalf and is expected to focus especially on building Hispanic and younger-voter support.

Noelle Bush: Bush's middle child and only daughter, who he has described as "the joy of my life." She has shunned the spotlight and isn't expected to play an active role with the campaign. She lives in Orlando and frequently visits her parents in Miami.

Jeb Bush Jr.: Bush's youngest child is also expected to be the most active. He is his father's former business partner, lives in Miami and has two young children with his wife, Sandra, who is of Iraqi and Jordanian descent and grew up in Canada. "Jebbie," as he's nicknamed, has already headlined several smaller-dollar fundraisers for his father's super PAC.

George H.W. Bush: The 41st president of the United States. Jeb Bush frequently tells voters that his father is "the greatest man alive."

Barbara Bush: The former first lady, who suggested in recent years that the country is "Bushed out" but now fully supports her son's campaign. Proudly outspoken, she said in a recent NBC interview, "I've promised that during this next campaign season, I will not talk."

George W. Bush: The 43rd president is Jeb Bush's older brother and widely seen as one of his biggest political liabilities. The former president has also said he plans to stay out of the limelight during the coming campaign season.

Marvin, Neil and Doro: Jeb Bush's younger siblings, who are active political figures. Marvin is usually the foil when Jeb jokes about his political family: "A lot of people, they know my dad, they know my brother – and I'm not talking about Marvin," he once told a Nevada crowd.

Josefina Gallo Esquivel: Jeb Bush's mother-in-law. He has invoked her story in discussions about federally-funded medical research by revealing that she has dementia. Esquivel lives under the care of her daughters in Miami.

John and Lucila Schmitz: If not for them, Jeb and Columba Bush probably would never have met. When Jeb first met Columba in Mexico, she was in a car with John and Lucila, who were dating at the time. The couple lives in Miami near the Bushes and Lucila and Columba's mother (see above).

Jorge Arrizurieta, Al Cardenas and Ana Navarro: They're among Bush's biggest backers and frequently called upon by reporters to illustrate his Miami roots, explain his political appeal or defend his viability. Arrizurieta first met Jeb Bush in the 1980s, held various roles during his governorship and is one of his top donors. Cardenas is a Miami-based super-lobbyist and his children went to school with Bush's. Navarro is a CNN commentator, veteran of Sen. John McCain's 2008 presidential campaign and her boyfriend, Gene Prescott, owns the famed Biltmore Hotel in Coral Gables.

TOP CAMPAIGN AIDES:

Sally Bradshaw: Senior campaign adviser. Next to his family, she's the most trusted person in his orbit. Bradshaw served as one of Bush's chiefs of staff when he was Florida governor and has spent most of the past year preparing her former boss to run for president. Her biggest asset? She has Bush's total confidence and vice versa. Her biggest weakness? Physical distance. She lives in Tallahassee on her family's chicken farm and has no plans to move to Miami and work from campaign headquarters.

Danny Diaz: Campaign manager. A Washington native and one-time plumber, he earned the big job last week in a surprise shakeup. At 39, he's a veteran operative who quickly earned the trust of Bush, who recently labeled his new manager "a grinder" -- high praise from the hard-charging governor. Diaz co-founded FP1 Strategies (which stands for "50 percent plus one") with Jon Downs, who will serve as head of Bush's media team (see below). He previously worked for the Republican National Committee, the National Republican Congressional Committee and the presidential campaigns of McCain and Mitt Romney.

David Kochel: Chief strategist. Initially expected to serve as campaign manager, he will focus first on building support in the first four primary states: Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina. He was one of Bush's first and boldest staff hires and helped signal the seriousness of the former governor's ambitions. An Iowa native, he's advised several GOP candidates for years and helped Romney place a close second in the 2012 GOP caucus.

Trent Wisecup: Director of strategy. During the 2012 cycle, he was strategist to the NRCC. He's also worked for former California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger, Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), Bush and Romney. Most recently, he worked for FP1 Strategies.

Justin Muzinch: Policy director. He's one of several Wall Street veterans poised to join Bush's team. Muzinich was most recently a vice president of Muzinich & Co., an international investment firm in New York. He's also been with Morgan Stanley and EMS Capital. Close with Glenn Hubbard, another occasional Bush adviser, Muzinich has advocated for revamping the U.S. Federal Reserve and U.S. foreign aid and has advocated for a new trade deal with Europe.

Scott Jennings: A Kentucky-based consultant who helped reelect Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) last year. He will advise the campaign on political matters. He ran Romney's 2012 operations in Ohio.

Heather Larrison: Finance director. It's her job to woo donors, keep them happy and raise as much money as possible for Bush's campaign. Her team has an ambitious goal of raising at least $5 million by June 30, in order to show a strong start when campaign finance filings are released July 15. She's been a finance aide for some of the most successful fundraisers in the GOP, including George W. Bush and Sen. Rob Portman (Ohio). She also had stints at the Republican Governors Association and National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Ann Herberger: A Miami-based GOP fundraiser, she runs the Woods Herberger Group, which has focused mostly on raising political money for the Bush family. Herberger has also served as a consultant for the RNC, RGA, NRSC and NRCC.

Jon Downs: Head of media and advertising. He's Diaz's business partner and worked on George W. Bush's 2000 campaign, helped run several other state races and worked as a congressional liaison in the Bush Justice Department.

Megan Sowards: General counsel. She held a similar post with the NRSC and was deputy general counsel for Romney's 2012 campaign.

Brenda Gianiny and David Hill: Head of research and polling teams. She served as pollster for George W. Bush's White House and on his 2004 reelection campaign. He has worked for several top GOP candidates and on behalf of more than 100 state ballot measures, including work that led to six amendments to Florida's constitution.

Alex Lundry: He'll be in charge of data analytics. He's a corporate and political consultant who worked on Romney's 2012 campaign.

Karen Unger: Head of voter engagement. A seasoned Florida political hand, she served as one of Bush's deputy chiefs of staff and director of external affairs and appointments. She also ran his 2002 reelection campaign and has managed other Florida political campaigns. Among Unger's early tasks is keeping in touch with Bush's 650-member alumni network of former staffers.

Annie Kelly: Iowa state director. She's most recently a former FP1 employee. During the 2014 cycle, she was a regional political director for NRCC, helping the GOP win five of the seven most competitive House races. In 2012, she managed the super competitive reelection of campaign of now-former Rep. Tom Latham (R-Iowa) in the Des Moines area.

Rich Killion: New Hampshire state director. He's a longtime Granite State political operative who's managed two statewide campaigns in the state and helped all incumbent GOP state senators win reelection last year.

Brett Doster and Jim Dyke: They're running Bush's operations. Doster is a Tallahassee-based consultant who has known and worked with Bush since his failed 1994 gubernatorial campaign. Dyke has longer ties to George W. Bush -- he was RNC communications director during the former president's 2004 reelection and a press secretary to former commerce secretary Donald Evans, one of the former president's closest friends.

Scott Schied and Ryan Erwin: Bush's Nevada state director and a senior adviser for Nevada. Schied most recently helped Rep. Crescent Hardy (R-Nev.) score a surprise win last year. Erwin worked for Romney's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, once led the Nevada GOP and had stints with Republican Party operations in California and Ohio.

Tim Miller: Campaign communications director. He most recently served as co-founder and executive director of America Rising, a super PAC that has spent millions of dollars digging into the histories of Democrats, especially Hillary Rodham Clinton. As if an encyclopedic knowledge of Clinton wasn't enough, Miller also worked last year on Wisconsin Republican Gov. Scott Walker's reelection campaign, giving him a unique understanding of one of Bush's biggest GOP rivals. He previously worked for McCain's 2008 campaign and Jon Huntsman's 2012 GOP presidential campaign.

Kristy Campbell: National press secretary. One of Bush's longest-serving aides and most frequent traveling companions, she served in his gubernatorial press office and later for his nonprofit education foundation. She was also a member of Romney's 2012 communications team. When reporters have questions about Bush's personal or professional past, Campbell usually gets the first call.

Michael Steel: Adviser for policy and communications. Most recently served as a spokesman for House Speaker

John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and previously as on-the-plane press secretary for Paul Ryan's 2012 vice presidential campaign. A North Carolina native, he worked for the state GOP during Thom Tillis's successful Senate against Democrat Kay Hagan last year.

Emily Benavides: Hispanic communications director – a unique role among top-tier GOP presidential campaigns. It's her job to keep in touch with reporters for Spanish-language newspapers and television reporters working for Univision, Telemundo and their affiliates. She previously worked for Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder.

Allie Brandenburger: A deputy press secretary, who previously worked for Rep. Jeff Denham (R-Calif.), Romney's 2012 campaign and the RNC.

Matt Gorman: Head of rapid response. He was deputy rapid response director for Romney's 2012 campaign.

Jose Mallea: Head of Latino engagement. A notable hire for Bush, because Mallea was manager of Sen. Marco Rubio's 2010 campaign. But he first made a name as an aide in George W. Bush's administration, holding several jobs, including special assistant to White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card.

Jordan Sekulow: Liaison to the evangelical community. An evangelical Christian attorney, he was executive director of American Center for Law & Justice, a conservative organization founded by televangelist Pat Robertson. Bush is Roman Catholic and eager to build support among conservative Christian Republicans, especially in Iowa and South Carolina.

James A. Baker III, George P. Shultz, Paul D. Wolfowitz, Michael Hayden, Stephen J. Hadley et al: They're part of a 21-member foreign policy advisory team Bush dramatically unveiled in February. The team includes a mix of moderates and neoconservatives who served during the presidencies of George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush. The group mostly consults Jeb Bush from afar.

Josh Venable: A policy aide, he's been part of Bush's traveling team, briefing him on the road and keeping tabs on what needs to be followed up on after events. Previously, he's the RNC's former deputy finance director and worked for Bush's nonprofit education foundation.

Stressing his experience as governor of Fla., Jeb Bush enters 2016 race // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe & Philip Rucker – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush, son and brother of former presidents, formally launched his campaign for the White House on Monday with a sweeping call to reform Washington and expand economic opportunity.

Against a diverse tableau at a boisterous rally here in the state he governed for eight years, Bush offered himself as a compassionate and tested chief executive who would fix a broken federal government and disrupt the country's political brinksmanship.

"We will take Washington — the static capital of this dynamic country — out of the business of causing problems," he said. "We will get back on the side of free enterprise and free people. I know we can fix this. Because I've done it."

With his mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, sitting in the front row, Jeb Bush directly confronted the family history that is both an asset and a liability. His father and brother, George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush, were not present, but he invoked them by saying that he met his first president the day he was born and his second when he was taken home from the hospital.

Still, he said that he did not believe his lineage should grant him the Republican nomination.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of résumé, party, seniority, family or family narrative," he said. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test, and it's wide open — exactly as a contest for president should be."

Addressing hundreds of supporters inside a Miami college gynasium, Bush spoke in aspirational terms about what he called a "nation filled with charitable hearts." He seemed determined to present a new, welcoming face for the Republican Party, looking as much to the general election as to the primaries.

He did not mention any GOP opponent by name, but he directly attacked Hillary Rodham Clinton, saying that the Democratic presidential front-runner sits atop "a no-suspense primary, for a no-change election" to succeed President Obama and would "slog on with the same agenda under another name."

"The presidency should not be passed on from one liberal to the next," he said.

Bush focused heavily on his record as Florida's governor, the office he held between 1999 and 2007. Under his leadership, he said, the state led the nation in job creation, income growth, balanced budgets and tax cuts.

"We don't need another president who merely holds the top spot among the pampered elites of Washington," he said. Later, he said, "I was a reforming governor, not just another member of the club."

As president, he said, he would "think big" about overhauling the tax code, undo Obama-era federal regulations and "get serious about limited government."

Bush laid out an ambitious goal of 4 percent economic growth, which he said would bring 19 million new jobs. “It’s possible,” he said. “It can be done.”

But he had nothing in his prepared remarks about immigration reform, an issue he has championed for years but that is particularly divisive for die-hard Republican base voters. Only when two dozen protesters stood in the rafters to interrupt him — they stripped off a layer of clothing to reveal neon T-shirts spelling out “Legal status is not enough” — did Bush weigh in on the subject.

“The next president of the United States will pass meaningful immigration reform,” he said, departing from the text in his teleprompters.

Monday’s event was strikingly different from most Republican campaign rallies this year, which have drawn overwhelmingly white crowds. Bush spoke at a campus of Miami Dade College, a system that boasts the largest Hispanic student body in the nation, and packed the gymnasium with cheering Asian, black and Latino supporters, young and old, who held up campaign signs in Spanish and English.

Before Bush took the stage, a family of Cuban singers performed regional classics. A black Baptist minister called Bush “a man of deep conviction.” The Colombian mother of a disabled daughter defended his record, in Spanish. Bush’s former lieutenant governor looked across the big crowd and said: “It looks like family. The Bush family — the big Bush family.”

Florida State Sen. Don Gaetz told the crowd that Bush is “the new Florida. He is the new America. He is the new Republican Party.”

The message Bush hoped to convey was clear: In a crowded field of candidates, he is the seasoned Republican who can broaden the GOP’s appeal among minority voters who long have voted for Democrats.

Bush, who returned over the weekend from a five-day visit to Europe, earned some of his loudest applause by assailing the Obama administration’s foreign policy record.

“With their phone-it-in foreign policy, the Obama-Clinton-Kerry team is leaving a legacy of crises uncontained, violence unopposed, enemies unnamed, friends undefended and alliances unraveling,” he said.

The announcement capped six months of aggressive travel and fundraising for Bush, 62, a regimen that suggested a presidential bid was never in doubt. Testing the boundaries of modern campaign finance law and tapping a donor network first cultivated by his extended family more than 30 years ago, Bush has stockpiled tens of millions of dollars for an allied super PAC that will operate independently of his campaign operation and attack his opponents as he seeks to build support in early primary states.

Bush enters a fluid race for the Republican nomination, where an array of younger rivals, including his one-time protege, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.), are posing strong challenges. Bush signaled that he would use his executive experience to draw a contrast between him and Rubio and other first-term senators.

“There’s no passing off responsibility when you’re a governor, no blending into the legislative crowd or filing an amendment and calling that success,” Bush said. “As our whole nation has learned since 2008, executive experience is another term for preparation, and there is no substitute for that.”

Gaetz used sharper language in introducing Bush. “The presidency of the United States does not come with training wheels,” he said, adding: “Jeb Bush is the Florida Republican who can win.”

From Miami, Bush planned to fly Monday night to launch a whirlwind four-day tour in New Hampshire, a state that will be critical to his early chances. On Wednesday, he is scheduled to visit Iowa, where conservatives remain deeply skeptical of his bid. In South Carolina on Thursday, he is expected to detail more of his military and foreign policy agenda. He plans to be in Washington on Friday for his first official campaign fundraiser, then return to Florida to headline a GOP fundraiser in Tampa.

Monday’s Miami rally took on the feel of a Bush family reunion. In addition to his mother, John Ellis Bush — nicknamed “Jeb” by his mother, for his initials — was joined by his wife, Columba, their three children and their own young families, plus his younger siblings, Neil Bush and Doro Bush Koch. The candidate’s extended political family was also present: Nearly 400 former staffers and supporters from campaigns past cheered in the arena.

“I’ve been waiting 30 years for Monday,” said Jorge Arrizurieta, a Miami businessman and longtime friend who has known Bush since the 1980s.

Since leaving office in 2007, Bush has launched a lucrative business career, including work with his youngest son, Jeb Jr., on investment and real estate ventures. Until last year, he also served as a special adviser to the British bank Barclays.

Politically, Bush remained an active proponent of an immigration overhaul and education standards commonly known as Common Core. His support for both issues is considered a disqualifying factor by conservatives opposed to easing of immigration laws or possible federal intervention in local education policy.

But on Monday, Bush's intended audience was far broader than the conservative base. He pledged to take his campaign "everywhere, speaking to everyone."

Near the end of his remarks he broke into fluent Spanish and directly appealed for the support of Latino voters. In English, he explained, "In any language, my message will be an optimistic one."

"I will take nothing and no one for granted," he said. "I will run with heart. I will run to win."

Jeb Bush's K Street connections // WaPo // Catherine Ho – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush on Monday officially kicked off his presidential campaign in Miami, taking aim at Washington while promising to get "the static capital of this dynamic country – out of the business of causing problems."

To do so, however, he will partly rely on the help of lobbyists who engage in the type of Washington work that Bush criticized as he launched his bid for the White House.

"Leaders have to think big, and we've got a tax code filled with small-time thinking and self-interested politics," Bush said in his Miami speech touting the need for tax reform. "What swarms of lobbyists have done, we can undo with a vastly simpler system – clearing out special favors for the few reducing rates for all."

Several of Bush's financial backers and supporters are Washington veterans and his deep ties to K Street will likely boost the former Florida governor's ability to raise big money and allow him to tap into a well of veteran policy advisers for his campaign.

His list of allies in the influence world include the heads of big lobby shops, Republican lawmakers-turned-lobbyists and longtime advisers to the Bush family.

Here's a sampling, but not a complete list, of Bush's K Street backers:

Kimberley Fritts, chief executive of lobby shop Podesta Group, worked for Jeb Bush during his first gubernatorial campaign in 1994, and is continuing her support this time around through fundraising and recruiting members of Congress to support the former Florida governor's efforts in their states.

"Last week we rolled out a number of endorsements with the Florida delegation," she said. "We think it's been going well." Fritts flew to Miami this morning to meet with members of Bush's team, and will head back to D.C. later today.

Tom Loeffler, the retired Texas congressman who now works at lobby giant Akin Gump, has been fundraising for Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise, for several months. Loeffler goes way back with the Bush family: he was the Texas political co-chairman for George H.W. Bush's 1988 campaign and a national adviser for the 1992 campaign. He later served as George W. Bush's Texas finance co-chairman for his 1994 gubernatorial campaign, Texas regional finance chairman for his 1998 campaign, national finance co-chairman for his 2000 presidential campaign and South Texas co-chairman for his 2004 campaign.

Bill Paxon, the retired New York congressman who now works at Akin Gump, is also fundraising on Bush's behalf.

Vin Weber, the retired Minnesota congressman who now works at lobby and public affairs shop Mercury, exchanged emails with Bush at least six months ago to express his commitment to the candidate. Weber said he is primarily interested in advising on policy — he spoke last month at an event for Bush's super PAC about economic mobility, one of the core parts of Bush's domestic agenda.

"I want to be helpful on the policy side of the campaign," Weber said. "I'm willing to raise money and give money but that's not what I'm best at. I want to coordinate policy to the extent that I can."

Denny Rehberg, the retired Montana congressman who now works at Mercury, is gathering support for Bush in Montana and Washington. He said he anticipates Bush will be drawing significant financial support from K Street. "When I think of K Street, I think of business, not necessarily lobbyists or government relations, but business," he said. "I think that he has a strong background of support for and from business."

GOP lobby shop S-3 Group, is working to recruit members of Congress to endorse Bush, and facilitating the exchange of ideas and information between the campaign and think tanks and other policy experts.

Lanny Griffth, chief executive of lobby shop BGR Group, has raised money for the candidate. Griffith served several roles in the George H.W. Bush administration, and was later a "Ranger" — the designation for those who raised at least $200,000 — for George W. Bush's 2004 campaign.

Jeb Bush Says He Will Run as a Political Outsider // WSJ // Beth Reinhard – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush, heir to one of American's most successful political dynasties, sought to jump-start his presidential campaign Monday as a scrappy political outsider after failing in recent months to emerge as the undisputed front-runner for the 2016 Republican nomination.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family or family narrative," said Mr. Bush, kin to two American presidents and a former two-term Florida governor. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test, and it's wide open."

In the six months he has been building his campaign, Mr. Bush has dropped in the national polls and finds himself unable so far to break from a crowded pack of GOP candidates, even though he is expected to raise the most money and has nabbed name-brand political talent.

Mr. Bush is reviving the logo he used for three gubernatorial campaigns—Jeb!—to emphasize that he is running not as a political scion but as his own man. Casting himself as a can-do chief executive, Mr. Bush drew his strongest contrasts to date with GOP rivals serving on Capitol Hill, including his former protégé, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio. "Executive experience is another term for preparation, and there is no substitute for that," Mr. Bush, who appeared without jacket or tie, told a cheering crowd his staff estimated at 3,000 people. "We are not going to clean up the mess in Washington by electing the people who either helped create it or have proven incapable of fixing it."

Mr. Bush also tried to repudiate the argument made by some of his rivals that as a member of the Bush family he would be less capable of prosecuting the case against Democratic front-runner and former first lady Hillary Clinton, who he said represented a "no-suspense primary" and "no-change election."

But presenting himself as the enemy of the "pampered elites" and the "rule makers" is a challenging argument for Mr. Bush, whose last name was on the national ticket in six of the last nine presidential elections.

Without providing specifics, Mr. Bush repeated his call for 4% annual economic growth and added that would translate into 19 million new jobs. The last time yearly inflation-adjusted growth in the nation's gross domestic product topped that percentage was in 2000, the year before his brother, President George W. Bush took office.

Mr. Bush said his two terms as governor showed he could boost growth, add jobs and cut taxes. In response, Florida's Democratic Party called Mr. Bush's tenure a "disaster" and said it would remind voters of what it called a racially motivated purge of voter files in the state and of Mr. Bush's effort to prolong the life of Terry Schiavo, the brain-damaged woman whose husband wanted to remove life support despite her parents' objections.

"His record as governor certainly showed his preference for giving tax breaks to his wealthy friends and deep-pocketed donors over the middle class," said a statement from the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, and brother didn't join the rally, but his mother, Barbara Bush, attended.

The group that vouched for Mr. Bush on stage defied the image of a party that fared poorly among minorities and women voters in the last two elections: an African-American pastor; the Hispanic mother of a disabled child; and the female lieutenant governor during Mr. Bush's second gubernatorial term.

Mr. Bush, who is fluent in Spanish, has vowed to campaign outside of GOP comfort zones: in black churches, Hispanic neighborhoods and college campuses. He is expected to begin campaigning in earnest in states hosting the earliest nominating contests.

After spending the last six months seeking donations of unlimited size for a super PAC, he must now follow federal rules requiring him to campaign independently of the PAC and raise money for his campaign in increments capped at $2,700.

The pursuit of donors began six hours before the rally, with dozens attending a "national call day" at a nearby hotel. Among those in attendance was New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, who joined Mr. Bush on a trip last week to three European countries.

One fundraiser and lobbyist, Slater Bayliss, shrugged off some of the pre-campaign hiccups. “It’s like when Michael Jordan came out of retirement. Sure, there’s a little bit of rust…that’s part of getting back into it,” Mr. Bayliss.

Jeb Bush’s Chance for Takeoff // WSJ // Gerald Seib – June 15, 2015

Many are the presidential candidates who hit their high water mark on the carefree day they announce their candidacy, then begin a slide downward as reality sets in.

Jeb Bush may be the other kind of candidate.

It’s just possible that Mr. Bush, who formally announces his candidacy on Monday, has endured the toughest stretch of his campaign in the seemingly interminable stretch between the day in December when he launched a committee to collect money for a presidential run and the birth of his actual campaign.

In that six-month stretch, Mr. Bush has borne the brunt of his two biggest problems—the fact that his famous name has become as much burden as asset, and the antipathy of many conservatives toward his immigration and education positions—without the ability to fully counter them. Convincing voters he isn’t just another guy named Bush requires offering the kind of fully formed rationale for a candidacy that only a real campaign can provide; easing conservative concerns requires the kind of extended conversation in the party’s trenches that a primary debate requires.

It’s also possible, of course, that Mr. Bush simply can’t overcome those two obstacles—that the time isn’t right, or has passed him by. Yet it seems likely that he is a better marathon runner than a sprinter, somebody who benefits from more exposure rather than less, and who has the money to endure a race that figures to be stretched out simply because of the time needed to winnow an extraordinarily large field.

“Jeb’s announcement is a new beginning,” says Scott Reed, a longtime Republican activist who ran Bob Dole’s 1996 presidential campaign. “He has developed a strong platform on issues, will be well funded and has the ability to go the distance, for this nomination fight may go to June and California to put someone over the top and secure a majority of the delegates.”

In any case, the Bush candidacy is tough to analyze, if only because its birth has been so unusual. In some ways it’s the campaign being run in reverse order:

Usually a candidate announces, then tries to take advantage of the surge of interest to raise money. The Bush forces, taking advantage of new fund-raising rules, decided to raise the money first, then formally announce.

Usually high name identification is a significant plus because it means the candidate has no need to spend millions of dollars to introduce himself or herself to voters. In this case, the big name appears to be a net disadvantage because of his brother’s complicated legacy and unease over political dynasties, and it will take millions of dollars to get beyond it.
Usually, the “campaign in disarray” stories come months into the effort. In this case, they came last week, before the formal campaign had even begun, when Mr. Bush made a surprise choice in picking a campaign manager.

So, given that unusual start, what is the path to the nomination for Mr. Bush?

In a campaign in which there may be 16 Republican candidates, the three who seem to have the most plausible chance to win the nomination appear to be Mr. Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio.

In the early going, Iowa appears to be strong ground for Mr. Walker, whose Midwestern roots are an advantage there. That makes New Hampshire’s primary especially important—Mr. Reed calls it “the money state”—for many of the others, including Mr. Bush.

For him, though, the key may be surviving the early states in February and getting on to the rush of bigger primary states that come in March. They will bring into play a more diverse universe of Republican primary voters, and allow Mr. Bush to take advantage of his money and what remains of a Bush family national political network.

In the middle of March comes what may be the most important event of all for Mr. Bush, which is the primary in his home state of Florida. He will collide head-on there with Mr. Rubio, his fellow Floridian and onetime protégé, and odds are that only one will survive that kind of home-field test.

Along the way, his advantage over Mr. Walker should be his ability to handle the national-security conversation that now figures to be a dominant element of the campaign as the security situation worsens in the Middle East and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ukraine. His advantage over Mr. Rubio should be a greater sense of stature and experience.

On immigration, he needs to reach that majority of Republican voters who, polls suggest, actually agree with his formula granting a path to legal status for undocumented aliens. On Common Core educational standards, he needs to convince skeptics that, yes, he's for standards, but ones set by states rather than the feds.

Overhanging all, though, is the task of getting past today's jaundiced views of the political establishment with which, for better or worse, he is well identified.

Jeb Bush vows to stay true to beliefs in opening '16 race that will test his conservatism // AP // Steve Peoples & Brendan Farrington – June 15, 2015

Vowing to win the Republican presidential nomination on his own merits, Jeb Bush launched a White House bid months in the making Monday with a promise to stay true to his beliefs — easier said than done in a bristling primary contest where his conservative credentials will be sharply challenged.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family, or family narrative. It's nobody's turn," Bush said, confronting critics who suggest he simply seeks to inherit the office already held by his father and brother. "It's everybody's test, and it's wide open — exactly as a contest for president should be."

Bush sought to turn the prime argument against his candidacy on its head, casting himself as the true Washington outsider while lashing out at competitors in both parties as being part of the problem. He opened his campaign at a rally near his south Florida home at Miami Dade College, an institution with a large and diverse student body that symbolizes the nation he seeks to lead.

"The presidency should not be passed on from one liberal to the next," he declared in a jab at Democratic favorite Hillary Rodham Clinton.

And he said: "We are not going to clean up the mess in Washington by electing the people who either helped create it or have proven incapable of fixing it."

That was an indirect but unmistakable swipe at Republican presidential rivals in the Senate. Among them is his political protege, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who welcomed Bush into the 2016 contest earlier in the day.

Bush enters a 2016 Republican contest that will test both his vision of conservatism and his ability to distance himself from family.

Neither his father, former President George H.W. Bush, nor his brother, former President George W. Bush, attended Monday's announcement. The family was represented instead by Jeb Bush's mother and former first lady, Barbara Bush, who once said that the country didn't need yet another Bush as president, and by his son George P. Bush, recently elected Texas land commissioner.

Before the event, the Bush campaign came out with a logo — Jeb! — that conspicuously leaves out the Bush surname.

Bush, whose wife is Mexican-born, addressed the packed college arena in English and Spanish, an unusual twist for a political speech aimed at a national audience.

"In any language, my message will be an optimistic one because I am certain that we can make the decades just ahead the greatest time ever to be alive in this world," he said. "I will campaign as I would serve, going everywhere, speaking to everyone, keeping my word, facing the issues without flinching,"

In the past six months, Bush has made clear he will remain committed to his core beliefs in the campaign to come — even if his positions on immigration and education standards are deeply unpopular among the conservative base of the party that plays an outsized role in the GOP primaries.

Tea party leader Mark Meckler on Monday said Bush's positions on education and immigration are "a nonstarter with many conservatives."

"There are two political dynasties eyeing 2016," said Meckler, a co-founder of the Tea Party Patriots, one of the movement's largest organizations, and now leader of Citizens for Self-Governance. "And before conservatives try to beat Hillary, they first need to beat Bush."

Yet a defiant Bush has showed little willingness to placate his party's right wing.

Instead, he aimed his message on Monday at the broader swath of the electorate that will ultimately decide the November 2016 general election. Minority voters, in particular, have fueled Democratic victories in the last two presidential elections.

Jeb Bush makes it official: 'I will run to win' // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 15, 2015

Declaring that it's nobody's turn and everybody's test, Jeb Bush joined the Republican race for president on Monday, as he sought to move beyond his family's history even as he seeks to become the third Bush in the White House.

"Not a one of us [candidates] deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family, or family narrative," Bush declared. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test, and it's wide open — exactly as a contest for president should be."

In his adopted hometown before a multicultural crowd of long-time friends, Bush sought to re-introduce himself to the country as a relentless reformer who has gotten results, who eschews the politics of grievance and offers a more hopeful and compassionate brand of conservatism.

Berthy De La Rosa-Aponte, a Florida advocate for individuals and children with disabilities and one of several friends who vouched for Bush's character and compassion before he took the podium, told the crowd the former governor "understands our lives, our needs, our struggles and our fears."

His empathy — and cool under pressure — was tested toward the end of his speech when shouts echoed from the rafters inside the gymnasium at Miami Dade College as a group of DREAMers removed their jackets to reveal neon yellow t-shirts that spelled out "LEGAL STATUS IS NOT ENOUGH," challenging Bush's position on immigration reform.

"I agree," Bush said. As the group was escorted out amidst rising cheers of "Jeb!", Bush promised that "the next president of the United States will pass meaningful immigration reform."

The momentary disruption highlighted one of Bush's biggest challenges: reconciling his own support for immigration reform and a path to legal status, which doesn't go far enough for the protesters, with a Republican base that wants a more strident stance against illegal immigration.

In officially announcing on Monday, Bush, 62, is ending a six-month exploration phase that allowed him to raise unlimited sums of money for the super PAC that will undergird his campaign but left little doubt along the way that this day was coming.
As he became the eleventh declared candidate in the crowded Republican field, Bush vowed to run hard in every state, and to maintain the same message throughout the long nomination process, rather than tacking to the right just to win the primary and then reversing course come the general election.

"I will campaign as I would serve, going everywhere, speaking to everyone, keeping my word, facing the issues without flinching, and staying true to what I believe," Bush said. "I will take nothing and no one for granted. I will run with heart. I will run to win."
He also set some bold goals — 4 percent annual economic growth under a Jeb Bush presidency (which he said would create 19 million jobs), and energy security for the United States within five years.

And he wasn't shy about taking on his Democratic and Republican rivals, some by name. He dinged Hillary Clinton for speaking about conflicts, at times, between the progressive agenda and religious charities. And he took on both former Secretary of State Clinton and Obama for a "phone-it-in foreign policy."

Sen. Marco Rubio was also not spared, with Florida State Sen. Don Gaetz, an introduction speaker, calling Bush "the Florida Republican who can win."
In his own remarks, Bush avoided mentioning any of his Republican rivals by name, stating only that his experience as a governor is superior to those of senators who can shrug off responsibility and blend into a crowd.

"As our whole nation has learned since 2008, executive experience is another term for preparation, and there is no substitute for that," Bush said.

Speaking at the largest and most diverse college in the country, Bush highlighted his strong connections to the Latino community. He reminded the audience of the sweeping conservative reforms he enacted as Florida governor and his commitment to governing based on free-market principles that will create economic and educational opportunities for people to "rise up."

"We will take command of our future once again in this country," Bush said. "We will lift our sights again, make opportunity common again, get events in the world moving our way again."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He also took a hawkish foreign policy stance, blasting the Obama administration for leaving behind "a legacy of crises uncontained, violence unopposed, enemies unnamed, friends undefended, and alliances unraveling." Despite the imperative of not reminding the country of his bellicose brother's presidency, Bush promised to restore Pentagon budget cuts and ensure that America is more engaged in the world.

Unlike some politicians known for more electrifying, soaring rhetoric, Bush argued that he's a proven leader who's shown an ability to put ideas and tough talk into practice, pointing to Florida's economic growth during his two terms, the education reforms he enacted and his penchant for vetoing spending bills.

"We will take Washington – the static capital of this dynamic country – out of the business of causing problems. We will get back on the side of free enterprise and free people. I know we can fix this. Because I've done it." Despite his presidential pedigree, Bush signaled that he will run a reform-minded campaign against Washington and its power class.

"We don't need another president who merely holds the top spot among the pampered elites of Washington," Bush said. "We need a president willing to challenge and disrupt the whole culture in our nation's capital."

Bush's mother Barbara Bush attended the announcement, but his brother and father were not scheduled to be there — a decision that underscores Bush's desire to present himself as his own man and candidate. The Jeb! logo that Bush revived over the weekend from his past campaigns also makes the point.

In his remarks, Bush only passingly referred to his parents; and even his words of gratitude for his wife, Columba, who usually serves as the overture to his stump speech, were condensed.

The announcement came as Bush tries to regain momentum. Despite raising an anticipated $100 million for his super PAC, Bush's "shock and awe" strategy has failed to play out the way he told donors it would. His team now foresees a long, hard fight for the nomination that will require the former Florida governor, eight years removed from holding elected office, to win the hearts and minds of a primary electorate that seems more enthralled with younger, more fiery candidates.

"My message will be an optimistic one because I am certain that we can make the decades just ahead in America the greatest time ever to be alive in this world."

From here, Bush heads off on an announcement tour that will take him through the first three states on the 2016 calendar. He'll hold events Tuesday in Derry, New Hampshire, Wednesday in Pella, Iowa, and Thursday in Charleston, South Carolina.

Jeb Bush says he doesn't need dynasty to win // Politico // Roger Simon – June 15, 2015

What Jeb Bush's presidential announcement speech lacked in grandeur Monday, it made up for in down home simplicity.

Unlike Hillary Clinton, who made her (second) announcement speech Saturday amid the grassy splendor of Roosevelt Island in New York, Bush went to a college gym in Miami.

Jeb did not need to "re-introduce" himself to America as Hillary did. While most people recognize his name, few have any idea of what he is about.

He has not helped that very much over the past few months. He has been raising large amounts of money, instead.

He has also made a few videos that range from the simplistic to the embarrassing.
"America's best days are in front of us," he said, concluding one video. "And we are going to lead the world."

Wow.

But on Monday, Jeb Bush had found a new voice.

"It's nobody's turn," he said, disarming his critics who say he is running on his family's name. "It's wide open — exactly as a contest for president should be."

He spoke mostly in English, but also in Spanish. The student body at Miami Dade College (Kendall Campus), where Jeb spoke, is 66 percent Hispanic. And the Republican Party needs no reminding how much it needs Hispanic votes to win in 2016.
"I will campaign as I will serve" Bush said, "by going everywhere.

"I will take nothing and no one for granted. I will run with heart and I will run to win."
Bush knew how high the stakes were for this speech. The past few weeks have been a series of bobbles for him, including four different answers about the war in Iraq in four days.

But he was extremely relaxed throughout his speech, resting his folded hands on the lectern, and peering out from his rimless glasses. He wore no jacket, just a button-down blue shirt and gray dress slacks.

His mother, wife, children, grandchildren and sister Doro were there, but George H.W. and George W. Bush stayed away, not wishing to overshadow Jeb.

They needn't have worried. The most popular Bush owned the crowd without speaking.
The crowd erupted in numerous ovations, but none so loud as when Jeb's mother, Barbara, was introduced and she spread her arms out to embrace the audience.
They did not seem like a dynasty. They seemed like a family.

And that is the image his campaign has been working hard on.

Unlike Hillary's (re)announcement in which she ticked off an entire, multi-item agenda, Bush stuck to generalities, but they were sometimes partisan and some stung.

"The presidency should not be passed down from one liberal to the next," Bush said in what turned out to be a huge applause line. "We need a president who will challenge and disrupt the whole culture in our nation's capital. And I will be that president."

Disrupt is a word the Bush campaign likes. They use it in the modern sense: overwhelming progress, like Amazon disrupting the book business and Uber disrupting the taxi business.

Bush lightly touched on foreign affairs, vowing support for the "brave, democratic state of Israel," but especially emphasized Cuba and whacked President Barack Obama for any plans to visit there.

"We don't need a glorified tourist to go to Havana in support of a failed Cuba," Bush said. "We need an American president to go to Havana in solidarity with a brave Cuban people and I am ready to be that president."

If he used the word "president" a lot, it's because he grew up around an unusual number of them.

"I met a president on the day I was born, and a second when I was brought home from the hospital," he said to the crowd's laughter.

It was an easygoing, almost lighthearted day.

Jeb may have what the Hillary campaign fears most about him: the ability to reach out and bond with an audience.

Hillary's husband had it, she doesn't yet, and if she faces Jeb in a general election, she is going to need it very badly.

Jeb Bush's Campaign Launch to be Featured on Snapchat // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 15, 2015

Soon after Jeb Bush makes his long-awaited announcement on Monday that he is running for president, he'll be on Snapchat.

Representatives from the popular photo messaging app will be on the scene at Miami Dade College, taking photos and video of the stage preparation for the the launch, Yahoo reports. The material from Jeb's announcement will be sent to a live feed on the app and broadcast to Snapchat's 100 million daily active users.

Bush's move onto Snapchat's live story feed will target a key constituency of young voters aged 18 to 34, who make up a majority of Snapchat users.

This is not the first time a presidential candidate has dipped his toes into the cutting-edge social media world. Rand Paul participated in the first-ever Snapchat senatorial interview in January, and Marco Rubio has a Pinterest page.

On the Democratic side, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has a Snapchat, and Hillary Clinton made the playlist from her campaign launch available on Spotify.

fundraising and polling but he has been making solid appearances before activists—and cable news—that could leave him in a solid understudy position should one of the marquee names stumble.

In national polling, Bush remains in the tight cluster of contenders atop opinion surveys but he faces serious challengers nipping at his heels, including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson. In fundraising, he remains a formidable candidate although his advisers have signaled that he is expected to fall short of the $100 million goal some in his circle thought was possible to collect before officially launching his campaign. Bush put together a raft of highly regarded consultants and operatives, yet last week he shuffled his team and brought aboard a sharp-elbowed operative to take over as campaign manager.

The campaign launched at a community college that Bush's critics were quick to point out that he, as Governor, signed a budget that cut funding from the school and resulted in fewer students finding desks. On the stage that Bush was set to begin a presidential bid that has been obvious for the last six months, a banner was ready announced him simply as "Jeb!" in bright red letters. Nowhere was his famous last name visible.

There was, however, no forgetting his family. Former first lady Barbara Bush was traveling from Maine to Florida for the launch. The family's patriarch, George H.W. Bush, was not, but he remains a revered figure among establishment-minded Republicans with an unrivaled resume in U.S. politics: former President, Vice President, CIA Director, Ambassador and Republican National Committee Chairman. Jeb Bush's brother, George W. Bush, has a trickier relationship with the party. He ended won the Presidency promising to govern as a "compassionate conservative" yet ended his two terms deeply unpopular as the public soured on the war in Iraq that he launched and frustrated about the 2008 economic crisis that consumed his final months in office. A Wall Street bailout may have averted a global financial meltdown but the use of taxpayer dollars prompted conservative outrage and planted the seeds of the anti-establishment tea party movement that now threatens Jeb Bush's candidacy.

For others inside the party, Jeb Bush's policy positions on education and immigration fall squarely outside GOP orthodoxy. Ahead of his announcement, conservative activist Brent Bozell told his 7 million online supporters that Bush "is unelectable" and would sacrifice conservatives' values. "Nominating him will be an exercise in futility—just as it was with Mitt Romney, John McCain and Bob Dole. All three were moderates who wound up losers, and Jeb Bush will be a loser, too, if he's nominated."

To them, Bush planned to signal he would not compromise on his support for higher education standards and an overhaul of the nation's immigration system: "I will campaign as I would serve, going everywhere, speaking to everyone, keeping my word, facing the issues without flinching, and staying true to what I believe."

Jeb Bush Seeks a Bigger Tent at Campaign Launch // TIME // Philip Elliott – June 15, 2015

Guests arrived at the community college to a soundtrack that included rapper Pitbull. The pre-game show included the national anthem sung by salsa legend Willy Chirino and, before that, songs in Spanish from his daughters. Those who spoke ahead of the candidate lauded his work to combat domestic violence and to help those who rely on social safety programs. The greying former Governor slipped passages of perfect Spanish into his speech and promised a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's broken immigration system. His Mexican-born wife watched him with a cautious smile.

Welcome to Jeb Bush's version of the Grand Old Party, one that he hopes can woo female and minority voters away from their historic home in the Democratic fold—all while defending domestic programs. As the 62-year-old Bush launched his White House campaign on Monday near Miami, it was clear his campaign was taking seriously its goal of expanding the appeal of a party that has shifted further and further rightward.

"I will campaign as I would serve, going everywhere, speaking to everyone, keeping my word, facing the issues without flinching and staying true to what I believe," Bush said at a kickoff event that was stage-managed with a finesse typically reserved for incumbent Presidents. It perhaps came naturally to a candidate who is the son of one President and brother to another.

"I will take nothing and no one for granted," Bush continued, anticipating questions over whether the country needs a third Bush as President. "I will run with heart. I will run to win."

Left largely unsaid: the last Republican to win the White House was his brother, George W. Bush. The year was 2004.

Since then, the party has seen itself overlooked by groups that are gaining their political clout as the nation's demographics shift. Things were so dire after Mitt Romney's loss in 2012 that the Republican National Committee—a body chaired four decades ago by another member of the Bush clan, George H.W. Bush—commissioned a report casually referred to as "the autopsy." Five leading operatives dug into political trends and, among other recommendations, prescribed aggressive outreach to minority and female voters, as well as softened rhetoric on immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One of that landmark report's five authors was Sally Bradshaw, a longtime Jeb Bush counselor who assembled his presidential-campaign-in-waiting. Watching Bush's rollout, it was as though he was building it from Bradshaw's blueprint. And, if Bush secures the GOP nomination, these early efforts at outreach could help him run against Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton.

Of course, candidates matter. And while Bush comes from prime presidential pedigree, nothing is pre-ordained and there are still seven long and competitive months before Iowa holds its leadoff Caucuses. Circling Bush is a stable for candidates looking to argue to very vocal conservative activists that Bush's support for immigration reform is unacceptable and his backing of higher education standards is disqualifying. "There are two political dynasties eyeing 2016, and before conservatives try to beat Hillary, they first need to beat Bush," said Mark Meckler, a co-founder of Tea Party Patriots.

The dynastic nature of the race is a challenge that Bush has struggled to address. During an early foreign policy speech, he flatly declared that he was his own man, not a clone of former President George W. Bush. His brother left the White House after two terms with high disapproval ratings in opinion surveys and many conservatives' scorn. The increasingly unpopular war in Iraq cratered his poll numbers while the economic crisis that crippled the economy in 2008 sent him home to Texas with few defenders. A Wall Street bailout may have averted a global financial meltdown but the use of taxpayer dollars prompted conservative outrage and planted the seeds of the anti-establishment tea party movement that now threatens Jeb Bush's candidacy.

Their father, former President George H.W. Bush, is another story in the GOP. He remains a revered figure among establishment-minded Republicans with an unrivaled resume in U.S. politics: former President, Vice President, CIA Director, Ambassador and RNC Chairman.

Neither former President was in the crowd. Former First Lady Barbara Bush sat in the front row, however, and drew wild applause from the crowd when her son introduced her.

"In this country of ours, the most improbable things can happen. Take that from a guy who met his first president on the day he was born, and his second on the day he was brought home from the hospital," Bush said of his father and brother.

In his bid to join upper reaches of the family business, Jeb Bush first faces a raft of serious rivals from Washington-based challengers Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky, Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida. (Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina is trailing his Senate colleagues in fundraising and polling but he has been making solid appearances before activists—and cable news—that could leave him in a solid understudy position should one of the marquee names stumble.)

Bush is running hard to steady his internal operations and to win over conservatives who still view him skeptically. "Not a one of us deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family or family narrative," Bush said in a clear jab at his rivals. "It's nobody's turn. ... It is entirely up to me to earn the nomination of my party and then to take our case all across this great and diverse nation."

In that diversity, Bush hopes his outreach gives him an advantage. After all, he already has the soundtrack for the inauguration ready.

Jeb Bush Invokes Baltimore Protests In Presidential Campaign Kickoff // HuffPo // Amanda Terkel – June 15, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) brought up the recent protests in Baltimore during his presidential campaign kickoff speech Monday, using them as a call for education reform around the country.

"In government, if we get a few big things right, we can make life better for millions of people, especially for kids in public schools," said Bush during his rally at Miami-Dade College. "Think of what we all watched not long ago in Baltimore, where so many young adults are walking around with no vision of a life beyond the life they know. It's a tragedy played out over and over and over again."

Bush then touted his own record in Florida, saying "low-income student achievement improved here more than any other state" after his reforms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We stopped processing kids along as if we didn’t care -- because we do care, and you don’t show that by counting out anyone’s child. You give them all a chance," he added.

Baltimore was shaken by riots and protests after the death of Freddie Gray, a 25-year-old African-American man who died after sustaining injuries in police custody in April.

"Here's what I believe," Bush said Monday. "When a school is just another dead end, every parent should have the right to send their child to a better school -- public, private or charter. Every school should have high standards, and the federal government should have nothing to do with setting them. Nationwide, if I'm president, we will take the power of choice away from the unions and bureaucrats and give it back to parents."

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton did not mention Baltimore in her kickoff rally on Saturday in New York City, although she has done so in the past in the context of criminal justice reform -- a topic that didn't come up in Bush's speech.

"From Ferguson, to Staten Island, to Baltimore, the patterns have become unmistakable and undeniable," Clinton said in April, referring to incidents where African-American men -- and a child -- have died at the hands of police. "Walter Scott shot in the back in Charleston, South Carolina -- unarmed, in debt, terrified of spending more time in jail for child support payments he couldn't afford. Tamir Rice shot in a park in Cleveland, Ohio, unarmed and just 12 years old. Eric Garner, choked to death after being stopped for selling cigarettes on the streets of our city. And now Freddie Gray, his spine nearly severed while in police custody."

Bush has been less vocal on the issue of criminal justice reform than many other presidential candidates, although he has signed on to a conservative group's campaign for cost-effective alternatives to prisons.

Jeb Bush Once Cut Funding to His Campaign Launch Site // TIME // Zeke Miller – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush is expected to trumpet his conservative credentials as the former governor of Florida Monday when he announces his presidential bid. But one casualty of his cost-conscious ways was the very school he selected to use as his announcement site.

A 2002 state constitutional amendment to limit class sizes in K-12 education, which Bush opposed, created a budget shortfall. The governor, who opposed new tax hikes, begrudgingly turned to colleges to fill the gap. Bush proposed cutting $111 million from the budgets of universities and community colleges, of which $10.3 million would have affected Miami Dade College, where Bush will launch his presidential bid.

College President Eduardo Padron emailed Bush when his budget was proposed, saying he was “disturbed and disappointed” by the proposed cuts. “We all understand the need for reductions in times of fiscal crisis; what’s beyond logical comprehension, however, are the huge inequities that are inherent in this budget proposal,” he wrote, arguing the college was bearing a disproportionate burden of cuts. “Our students are among the most needy in the state and cannot continue to bear the burden of the costs of education.”

Bush replied that he was working on a solution. “I know you are upset,” he said by email. “We are doing our best under difficult circumstances and will work with the legislature to identify ways that we can improve the situation.”

Bush ultimately signed a budget that cut $11 million from community colleges’ budgets, forcing them to turn away about 35,000 students looking to enroll, including 9,500 would-be Miami Dade College students.

By 2004, Bush was able to fully fund community colleges, earning plaudits from state educators.

Bush takes on immigration -- but at hecklers' request // CNN // Thedore Schleifer – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush didn't plan to talk about immigration at all when announcing his presidential run -- until protestors made him.

Bush took his only departure from his prepared remarks Monday to respond to a group of people heckling him on immigration reform. As Bush introduced his mother to the Miami crowd, Bush shot back.

"The next president will pass meaningful immigration reform so that will be resolved -- not by executive order," the former Florida governor said.

Bush, like most of the Republican field, has criticized President Barack Obama's reliance on executive orders to shield some undocumented immigrants from deportation. Bush himself has been one of the few GOP hopefuls to embrace a pathway to legal status for those immigrants, though his Republican rivals will almost certainly look to tarnish him with supporting what they deem "amnesty."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The now-official presidential candidate is asked routinely on the stump about his immigration position, which is expected to be a serious liability among the Republican base. But it wasn't a topic he approached Monday in his remarks.

As he frequently does do, Bush detailed the story of how he met his Latina wife, Columba, while studying abroad in Mexico, and spoke for about 20 seconds in Spanish.

"As a candidate, I intend to let everyone hear my message, including the many who can express their love of country in a different language," Bush said.

Jeb Bush strikes softer tone at start of White House run // Reuters // Steve Holland – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush cast himself as a more moderate type of Republican while still holding on to his conservative principles as he began his U.S. presidential bid with an eye on the Hispanic vote which has eluded the party for years.

The former Florida governor announced his campaign for the Republican nomination to run in the November 2016 election at a multicultural college in Miami where he promised to pass meaningful immigration reform, spoke fluent Spanish and reminded voters he married a Mexican.

It was part of an effort by Bush, 62, to strike a different tone in a crowded field of 10 other Republicans and at the same time also showing he was keen to move out of the shadow of his father and brother and their White House legacies.

Even though the Bush family has a long history at the pinnacle of Washington government and politics, Bush portrayed himself as an outsider. He vowed to reform Washington, but Bush is only the latest candidate in the field to do so.

“We don’t need another president who merely holds the top spot among the pampered elites of Washington. We need a president willing to challenge and disrupt the whole culture in our nation’s capital," Bush, who was governor of Florida from 1999 to 2007, told supporters at Miami Dade College.

His speech was mostly the standard Republican fare of attacks on big government, and promises to protect free enterprise and strengthen America's role in the world.

But the tone of the campaign launch showed he seeks to use his links to Latino culture to give himself a lift over his Republican rivals, even if two of them - senators Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz - have stronger Hispanic credentials than Bush does.

Bush was preceded on stage by the Chirino Sisters, a Miami singing trio who sang a classic Cuban song, and an African-American preacher.

"As a candidate, I intend to let everyone hear my message, including the many who can express their love of country in a different language," Bush said, before switching to Spanish and calling on Latinos to "help us have a campaign that welcomes you."

Latinos will make up more than 10 percent of the electorate in 2016 and are important in swing states such as Nevada, Florida and Colorado.

Senator John McCain of Arizona won 31 percent among Hispanics in 2008, down from a stronger performance by Bush's brother President George W. Bush who was backed by 44 percent of Latino voters in 2004.

LATINO VOTERS

"I think Republicans have got to try something. It’s pretty hard for them to win the White House if current Hispanic voting trends continue. (Bush) has some unique abilities to appeal to those voters and he’s going to maximize them,” said David Yepsen, director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University.

Bush's speech on Monday was briefly interrupted by pro-immigration reform protesters.

He quickly responded: "By the way. Just so that our friends know. The next president will pass meaningful immigration reform so that that will be solved not by executive order," Bush said, in reference to President Barack Obama's use of presidential powers to ease immigration restrictions.

six months ago, but that has now dissipated. He is essentially tied for the lead with a host of challengers.

He was joined on Monday by his mother Barbara Bush, 90, at the event. Former presidents George H.W. Bush, his father, and George W. Bush, his brother, did not attend.

Bush reminded voters that his wife Columba was a Mexican he met on a visit south of the Rio Grande more than 40 years ago.

"In 1971, 8 years before then-candidate Ronald Reagan said that we should stop thinking of our neighbors as foreigners, I was ahead of my time in cross-border outreach," Bush said.

Both previous Bush presidents left office with low approval ratings. The legacy of Jeb's brother is particularly difficult because he ordered the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the financial crisis that erupted toward the end of his time in office.

Distancing himself from the pair, without being disloyal to his family, will be tricky for the younger Bush. His campaign logo "Jeb!" avoids using the family surname.

“I think the biggest hurdle is he is going to have to sell himself as his own person, not his brother and not his father,” said Fran Hancock, 64, a supporter who was at Monday's event.

Bush criticized former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in 2016.

“With their phone-it-in foreign policy, the Obama-Clinton-Kerry team is leaving a legacy of crises uncontained, violence unopposed, enemies unnamed, friends undefended, and alliances unraveling," he said.

Democrats made sure to remind voters of the George W. Bush's record.

"We already know what to expect from a Bush presidency, because we’ve seen it before. Jeb Bush supported his brother’s disastrous economic and foreign policies that made us weaker at home and abroad," said Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, head of the Democratic National Committee.

Jeb Bush’s announcement speech made me bullish on Marco Rubio // VOX // Ezra Klein – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush's campaign announcement speech was pretty good, I thought. The biggest problem was that it was delivered by a candidate named Bush.

The core of Bush's message was simple: Democrats haven't delivered. "They have offered a progressive agenda that includes everything but progress," Bush raged. "They are responsible for the slowest economic recovery ever, the biggest debt increases ever, a massive tax increase on the middle class, the relentless buildup of the regulatory state, and the swift, mindless drawdown of a military that was generations in the making."

The problem? Bushes haven't delivered either. That slow economic recovery Bush mentions was the product of one of the deepest economic crashes in American history — a crash presided over by Jeb's brother, George W. Bush. That runup in debt? It also began under his brother. The red tape Bush loathes? According to OMB Watch, the Bush administration published new regulations at about the same clip as the Obama administration:

Bush's kicker is meant to be brutal. "I, for one, am not eager to see what another four years would look like under that kind of leadership," he says. But it is trivially easy to reverse the line. Is the country really so eager to see another four years under the kind of leadership that preceded the Obama administration?

Of course, Bush would say, correctly, that he isn't his brother. He isn't responsible for his brother's administration. He's his own man. And in this speech, Bush tried to subtly distance himself from his brother's record, lamenting "all the families who haven't gotten a raise in 15 years." But as Ramesh Ponnuru writes, that begs a follow-up question: why didn't people get raises during the last Republican administration?

So far, Bush hasn't delivered much of an answer for that one. He's gently criticized government spending under his brother's administration — "I think he let the Republican Congress get a little out of control in terms of the spending," he said on CBS — but that's not even a remotely plausible explanation for the economic failures of the Bush years. And more tellingly, many of Jeb Bush's economic advisers were also key voices in his brother's administration.

An easy way for Bush to distance himself from his brother would be to propose a sharply different policy agenda. But there was no sign of it in his speech. Bush's platform, like his brother's, will focus heavily on budget-busting tax cuts and promises of deregulation and deficit reduction. It is easy to imagine the ads splicing the two Bush campaigns together, and reminding Americans they have heard these promises before.

The prospect has Republicans worried, too. In Slate, conservative columnist Reihan Salam greeted Bush's announcement with a column begging him to drop out of the race.

Bush can't attack the past without attacking himself...but Marco Rubio can Bush's line of attack on Clinton is natural: he wants to connect her to the failures of the previous administration. But it's a line of attack that damns Bush as surely as it damns Clinton.

Indeed, it might damn Bush more surely than it damns Clinton. The 4 percent economic growth Bush promised can't be found during Obama's presidency, but it also can't be found under either of the presidencies run by a man named Bush. Instead, the last time America saw 4 percent growth was under Bill Clinton — and as my colleague Matt Yglesias writes, "his services as an adviser are already spoken for."

Perhaps Bush could try to argue that the Clinton boom was partially the result of President George H. W. Bush's deficit reduction. There's a good case to be made that that's true — but H. W. Bush was only able to reduce the deficit so sharply by raising taxes, and there's little chance Jeb Bush will endorse that stratagem.

Bush wants to force Hillary Clinton to defend Barack Obama's record, but she has the advantage — particularly on domestic policy — of being more closely connected to Bill Clinton's. Meanwhile, Bush's demands that Clinton answer for past presidencies will ensure that he is held to the same standard — and at the moment, he doesn't have good answers.

I don't mean to be too hard on Bush. His speech was well-written and well-delivered. It was particularly affecting when, toward the end, Bush said, "I intend to let everyone hear my message, including the many who can express their love of country in a different language," and then transitioned into fluent Spanish. And when Bush was interrupted by an immigration protestor, he said what the Republican Party needs Hispanic voters to believe: that he would pass immigration reform.

But for that reason, Bush's speech had the unintended effect of making me more bullish on Marco Rubio, who brings many of Bush's political strengths but is free of his most serious weakness.

Jeb Bush's path more like dad than brother // The Miami Herald – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush's biggest challenge may be setting himself apart from his brother. Yet Bush has managed to do that in one way he didn't want: the path to the Republican presidential nomination.

Unlike his brother's aggressive launch for the presidency in 2000, when George W. Bush bulldozed most GOP competitors out of the field, Jeb Bush is looking at more than a dozen challengers, some with significant resources and staying power.

Indeed, the route may bear more resemblance to his father's 1988 grueling chase to the nomination. Despite being vice president, George H.W. Bush faced considerable competition from Sen. Bob Dole and evangelical leader Pat Robertson before winning the nomination and then the White House.

Jeb Bush has raised gobs of money. That – and backing from much of the Republican establishment – helped keep 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney from jumping in again.

But since then, Bush's muddled efforts at distinguishing himself and sustained antipathy from conservatives who oppose his positions on immigration and education have done little to convince anyone else to stay out – a factor aided by the rise of political action committees and deep-pocket donors that make it easier for more candidates to stay in the running.

"He really finds himself smack dab in the middle of the pack in a huge field of Republican candidates," said Iowa Republican analyst Craig Robinson. "They thought it was going to be Romney 2012, where it's the front-runner and then everybody else. But he is part of the everybody else."

Bush has said he didn't expect a coronation, but Robinson says the slow walk out created a stall. Bush trails in Iowa, the state that kicks off the nominating season next winter, in a pack well behind Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin.

"I think they overestimated Jeb Bush," Robinson said. "Yes, his last name is Bush and yes he's going to raise all kinds of money, but people don't know him."

That lack of certitude could aid Bush in independent-minded New Hampshire, where voters pride themselves in taking their own measure of the candidates. Bush has a very narrow edge over Walker there.

“He’s not a front-runner in the normal sense and I don’t think anyone wants a front-runner,” said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire Republican activist and former state attorney general who is not affiliated with any of the campaigns. “Voters in New Hampshire enjoy the opportunity to choose without anyone telling them what they’re going to do.”

The contrast with his brother – who came into New Hampshire as the undisputed front-runner only to lose to John McCain – also could help the former Florida governor stake his own claim running from inside the pack rather than from on high.His father in 1988 had lost Iowa, then fought back to win New Hampshire, prompting a bitter Dole to complain that Bush should “stop lying about my record.”

“He’s going to have to fight,” Rath said of the current race. “I think Jeb Bush understands that, and I think he probably welcomes the opportunity to fight because it’s an opportunity to prove who he is.”

Bush’s slow walk to official candidacy produced a rocky start: Even some of his supporters were aghast when it took him a week to articulate an answer to a question about the Iraq war his brother initiated. He’s sputtered in polls and his fledgling campaign became headline news for a staffing shakeup.

But it also may have allowed Bush, who hadn’t been on a campaign trail since 2002, to get in some practice in the punishing pace of campaigning in the era of Twitter and Periscope. He’s grown more comfortable delivering a stump speech, though he still fares better in one-on-one exchanges. He wrapped up a trip to Germany, Poland and Estonia with solid reviews – and avoided the gaffes that have overshadowed trips by other candidates.

“I never got the impression that anyone in that campaign thought the waters were going to part for Jeb Bush,” said Chip Felkel, an unaffiliated Republican strategist in South Carolina who worked for George W. Bush and George H.W. Bush. “It’s a different ballgame, a different year. The party has become a lot more fractious and they know that.”

Bush and Walker are neck and neck in South Carolina. That may mirror increased pragmatism after South Carolina Republicans in 2012 boosted former House Speaker Newt Gingrich in the primary, only to see him lose the nomination.

“Republicans want to win this election and I think people are going to gravitate to the most conservative who in turn can win a general election,” Felkel said.

Bush’s first challenge will be emerging from the family shadow with an identity of his own. Rivals such as Walker and Bush’s one-time Florida ally, Sen. Marco Rubio, are fresher faces. Rubio, especially, has sought to create a sharper generational contrast with Democrat Hillary Clinton.

“There’s only one candidate that had a backpack with weight to overcome, the Bush identity both helps and hurts,” said Al Cardenas, a longtime Bush adviser and former chairman of the Florida Republican Party. “His greatest access to improvement is leaving the Bush identity and gaining the Jeb ID with as many as voters as possible.”

Jeb Bush Borrows Hillary Clinton Strategy, Uses Snapchat to Launch Presidential Campaign // The Wrap // Kathy Zerbib – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush is following Hillary Clinton’s lead and taking his presidential campaign to Snapchat. The former Florida governor will declare his intentions for the Republican presidential nomination at Miami Dade College on Monday afternoon, streaming the appearance live on the app.

Before the much-anticipated announcement, Snapchat will post behind-the-scenes photos and videos as the college prepares for Bush’s arrival. These exclusive sneak peeks will be featured on the app’s Our Story feed for all users to see.

According Bush’s communications director, Tim Miller, this is an opportunity to reach a “broad, younger audience.” By incorporating Snapchat into his presidential campaign, he hopes to give users a “more authentic view” of what happens at an announcement.

Each of the 2016 presidential candidates can be found on a number of social networking sites and apps, such as Facebook, Twitter, Spotify, LinkedIn, Periscope and Snapchat. Bush, however, is the first to partner directly with Snapchat to launch a presidential campaign.

Snapchat is a Los Angeles-based company with 100 million daily active users, the majority of whom are 18-34 years old.

Jeb Bush Goes Off Script To Promise Immigration Reform // HuffPo // Elise Foley – June 15, 2015

Newly announced GOP presidential candidate Jeb Bush went off script on Monday to pledge to pass immigration reform, in one of the most surprising moments of his announcement speech.

He wasn't initially planning to mention immigration, which underscores how difficult an issue it is for him in the primary, as he tries to avoid charges of supporting "amnesty" without backing away from his record and being seen as a flip-flopper. The 2,000-word prepared remarks don't include "immigration" at all.

A group of immigration advocates attended the speech in Miami wearing yellow shirts that spelled out "legal status is not enough."

As Bush was talking about his family, he broke away from his prepared speech to address them.

"By the way, just so that our friends know, the next president of the United States will pass meaningful immigration reform so that that will be solved -- not by executive order," Bush said, to applause.

Bush's statement was a reference to President Barack Obama's deportation relief policies that came in lieu of action from Congress. The president's first deportation relief program, the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, or DACA, was announced exactly three years ago. The program has allowed more than 660,000 undocumented young people who came to the U.S. as children to stay and work legally on a temporary basis.

Obama announced plans last November to expand DACA to some older undocumented immigrants who came to the U.S. as children, and to create a new program to grant similar benefits to parents of U.S. citizens and legal permanent residents. Both the expanded DACA and the new deferred action program have been temporarily blocked in the courts.

Bush has said he opposes Obama's actions, but said he wanted to replace them with immigration reform legislation. He has also backed away somewhat from his past support for a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, instead saying he supports "a path to legalized status," which could allow them to eventually obtain citizenship.

According to a statement, the immigration advocates who interrupted Bush's speech were from the groups Homestead ERA, United We Dream, GetEQUAL Florida, Dreamers Mom's, Alliance for Citizenship, United Families, Farm-Workers Association, the American Friends Service Committee and WeCount.

Mariana Martinez, a member of the group Homestead ERA, said they protested because Bush "has been all over the map on immigration."

"He's also stated his support of reform with legalization for the undocumented community, but of any immigration reform we demand full and equal citizenship that doesn't leave millions of our loved ones in a permanent second class status," she said.

Other GOP presidential candidates have not devoted much time to immigration in their early speeches. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who helped draft a comprehensive immigration reform bill that passed the Senate in 2013, didn't discuss it. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) gave it only a cursory mention.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) asked his supporters to "imagine a president that finally, finally, finally secures the borders," criticizing Obama's "lawlessness and the president's unconstitutional executive amnesty."

Laura Ingraham: 'Welcome to the race, Jeb --- now drop out' // The Washington Examiner // Paul Bedard – June 15, 2015

Conservatives are not waiting to hear Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's presidential announcement speech to slam him as unelectable.

"Welcome to the race, Jeb — now drop out," tweeted conservative radio talker Laura Ingraham.

"Jeb Bush will be a loser," added Brent Bozell, who runs both the Media Research Center and the conservative group ForAmerica. The group has been opposing Bush and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton on their website.

Ingraham is one of talk radio's loudest voices against Bush, and she is joined by others, notably Mark Levin. Levin on Monday wrote a simple reaction to Bush on his Facebook page: "No to Jeb."

Critics do not believe that Bush is conservative enough and they charge that he has moved to the left on immigration and education, charges Bush rejects.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bozell issued a long statement sizing up the Right's complaints. "We've said it before and we say it again: Jeb Bush is unelectable," said Bozell. "Nominating him will be an exercise in futility — just as it was with Mitt Romney, John McCain and Bob Dole. All three were moderates who wound up losers, and Jeb Bush will be a loser, too — if he's nominated."

If Jeb wants 4 percent growth, he'll have to ask Bill Clinton how to do it // VOX // Matthew Iglesias – June 15, 2015

"So many challenges could be overcome if we just get this economy growing at full strength," Jeb Bush observed in his presidential campaign kickoff speech, "there is not a reason in the world why we cannot grow at a rate of four percent a year."

Most economists would say that there are actually some fairly profound reasons why achieving such a rapid growth rate on a sustained basis is difficult. But if Jeb's not interested in dreary academic controversies, he might want to ask his brother George about this. The economy, you see, grew slower than 4 percent in 2001. It also did so in 2002. And in 2003. And in 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008.

He also might want to phone up his dad, who served four years in the White House and never achieved 4 percent growth. You can also talk about this in job-creation terms, where Jeb's dad is the second-worst president to take office in the past fifty years, surpassed in unimpressiveness only by Jeb's brother.

There is, of course, one living president who achieved 4 percent growth in five out of his eight years in office — Bill Clinton. He'd probably be a good guy to speak to if you're interested in some ideas about how to achieve 4 percent growth. But I think his services as an advisor are already spoken for.

Snappy start: Jeb goes tech with launch // CNN // Ashley Codiani – June 15, 2015

In just a few hours, Jeb Bush will be among the many 2016 presidential hopefuls experimenting with the disappearing messaging app, Snapchat.

Yahoo reports that representatives from the popular application will be on the ground snapping photos and videos for curation on Snapchat's live story feed, which can be viewed by as many as 100 million of Snapchat's daily users.

To be clear, this is not Jeb Bush joining Snapchat, like his snapchatting GOP opponents Sen. Rand Paul (SenatorRandPaul), Sen. Marco Rubio (marcorubio2016) and Gov. Rick Perry (GovernorPerry). Rather, it's Snapchat using Bush's campaign launch to showcase the app's storytelling abilities.

Perry, on the other hand, snapchatted this just prior to his announcement and only got a reach equal to his followers.

On the Democratic side, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (governoromalley) used Snapchat to tease the location of his May 30th presidential announcement, and later live -snapped his 2016 announcement from the sidelines:

Hillary Clinton, like Jeb, is also not officially on Snapchat. But while delivering her first major speech of her campaign on Saturday, she was featured as part of Snapchat's "Our Story." Here, users at the event could contribute their own Snaps to a curated story:

While they didn't snap, her campaign experimented in other ways with the popular annotation site Genius (formerly 'Rap Genius) by annotating her full speech:

They also live streamed the entire rally on Periscope just after launching her campaign playlist on Spotify:

But what makes Bush's Snapchat experiment unique (other than the fact he's not officially on the platform) is it's direct partnership with the social media company. Monday's campaign event will mark the first time a candidate has leveraged a relationship with Snapchat to gain full access to the platforms active users -- namely, the coveted 18-34 demographic. So far, others in the 2016 have been building their audience as an individual user without the force of Snapchat's influence.

5 Policy Issues that Show Why Jeb Bush Will Lose the Latino Vote // Latino Decisions // Matt Barreto & Gary Segura – June 15, 2015

After Mitt Romney's disastrous performance with Latino voters in 2012, some election observers have suggested Jeb Bush is the obvious candidate to help Republicans win over Latino voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's supposed advantages are based on three specific observations—that the Bush family has historically had a more positive relationship with this community than other candidates in the GOP, that the Spanish-speaking Jeb personally benefits from having a Mexican-born wife and Mexican-American children, and that Bush has a history of more moderate positions on issues of importance to the Latino community.

None of these is likely to withstand deeper examination. The first two—the broader family history and the personal characteristics of Bush's immediate family—are based on a form of identity politics that Latinos seldom if ever practice. Latino voters have proven more than willing to reject even actual Latinos as candidates when their policy positions are in contrast to the community preferences. Bush's marriage and linguistic skills, while symbolically important, would founder if his issue positions are in contrast to the average Latino voter.

So what about those issue positions? Bush's misplaced reputation for moderation is belied by his actual policy record. And few if any analysts have stopped to consider how Bush's specific policy issues line up with Latino support for key policy issues. If Bush is to ultimately be the Republican nominee, Latino voters will no-doubt review and assess his policy commitments. In a review of recent statements by Jeb Bush, we find five significant policy areas where Latino public opinion stands in direct contrast to policy advocated by Jeb Bush. Additionally, Jeb Bush is not currently campaigning for the average Latino voter but, rather, is campaigning for the average GOP primary voter, his path over the next months is far more likely to push him further away from the average Latino voter on a wide range of important policy issues.

Here are five policy areas where Jeb Bush is at odds with Latino voter public opinion:

1. Obama's Executive Orders on Immigration

Jeb Bush has said that he is against the Obama executive orders on immigration reform which would protect from deportation young immigrants who came to the country as children (DACA), and immigrants who are the parents of U.S. citizens (DAPA). When asked if he would undo the most recent Obama executive orders Bush told radio host Michael Medved, "The DACA and the DAPA? Yes I would" and called the Obama immigration orders "ill-advised." When it comes to comprehensive immigration reform, Bush has said "He would greatly strengthen border security, linking any legalized status for illegal immigrants to tangible progress on objective border security metrics." And wrote in his 2013 book that "Permanent residency in this context, however, should not lead to citizenship."

In a November 2014 poll of Latino registered voters nationwide 89% said they supported the Obama executive actions known as DACA and DAPA, and 80% said they would oppose any efforts to block or repeal these executive actions protecting immigrants. In another poll conducted in November of 2014, 67% of Latinos voters said immigration issues were either the most important, or one of the most important issues in evaluating candidates and their decision to vote.

Further, Latino voters strongly reject a "border security first" approach – only 13% support Bush on that in a 2013 national survey, while 81% said they want to see a focus on a path to citizenship implemented at the same time any border security measures are implemented, not making a path to citizenship contingent on border security litmus tests as Bush has proposed.

Finally, when asked in 2013 what they thought about giving immigrants legal status, but not citizenship, 78% of Latino voters said they would oppose such a plan. In every survey we have seen on this point, Latino voters reject any notion of second-class status for immigrants.

2. Medicaid Expansion and Obamacare

Latinos continue to have the highest rates of being uninsured. According to one estimate, 200,000 Latinos in Jeb Bush's home state of Florida alone would gain health insurance through Medicaid expansion, which Florida has blocked. On the issue of Medicaid expansion Bush has said he does not support expanding Medicaid under Obamacare because "expanding Medicaid without reforming it is not going to solve our problems over the long run" and called Obamacare a "monstrosity" and "flawed to its core"

In a Nov 2014 poll of Latino voters 77% nationwide and 74% of Latinos in Florida said they thought states should take federal money to expand Medicaid programs. When it comes to Obamacare, only 25% of Latino voters in 2012 said they wanted to see it repealed, while fully 66% said they think the federal government should help ensure access to health insurance. In a national poll in 2013, fully 89% of Latinos said they wanted to learn more about the benefits available under the Affordable Care Act and 75% said "in the long run" the ACA will be good for Latinos in the U.S.

3. Raising the Minimum Wage

On minimum wage, Jeb Bush has said he is against raising the minimum wage and wants to let the private sector decide what the minimum pay should be, "We need to leave it to the private sector. I think state minimum wages are fine. The federal government shouldn't be doing this"

Latino workers are heavily represented in lower income categories and disproportionately find themselves as minimum wage workers. In a Nov 2014 poll of Latino voters, 78% said they want to see the federal minimum wage raised to $10.10 per hour, including 80% of Latino voters in Florida. While Jeb Bush stated that "minimum wages are fine" a national poll in July 2014 found that 67% of Latino were somewhat or very concerned they were currently not earning enough to pay their basic expenses.

4. The Importance of Addressing Climate Change

On environmental issues and climate change Jeb Bush has that it's not clear that climate change is a man-made phenomenon and that the EPA is doing too much and that "We have to begin to rein in this top-down driven regulatory system." Bush says he wants the federal government to provide more incentives for hydraulic fracking and horizontal drilling.

In contrast to Jeb Bush, 82% of Latinos in a 2013 national poll said they were somewhat or very concerned that human activity is causing the earth to get warmer. In contrast to a weaker EPA, 77% of Latinos said they would support the President taking executive action through the EPA to flight climate change. On the issue of fracking, polling data from Colorado, a state where hydraulic fracking for oil shale was being debated, found that 70% of Latinos opposed increased fracking and oil shale development. Overall, 84% of Latino voters in 2014 said it was important for the federal government to take measures to reduce carbon pollution.

5. Taxes on the Super Wealthy

When it comes to the federal budget deficit, Jeb Bush created a bit of a stir three years ago when he said he was open to small revenue increases, however a senior spokesperson, Kristy Campbell, made clear in 2014 that Gov. Bush does not support any new tax increases. Rather, a headline in Forbes Magazine outlining the Bush tax plan said "Jeb Bush Catered Tax Cuts to the Wealthy" pointing out that he favored providing tax cuts for the wealthy and "tax relief for rich investors." Coupled with tax cuts for the wealthy, Bush has called for more spending cuts and touted his record as Florida Governor in vetoing state budgets for schools, job training and parks, regularly bragging about his extensive use of the line-item veto to cut state spending.

Polling data from Latino Decisions has repeatedly found Latinos oppose additional cuts to government services and instead support new tax increases on the most wealthy as a way to generate more revenue to address the deficit. In a 2012 poll of Latino voters 87% wanted to see tax increases on the super wealthy as part of the budget deficit solution, including 82% of Latino voters in Florida. When given a direct choice between lowering taxes or increasing government investment, only 25% of Latinos thought lowering taxes was the best approach to help the economy grow while 67% thought increased investment in new infrastructure projects was more important.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio sent praising note to Jeb Bush ahead of his announcement // Fox News // Serafin Gomez – June 15, 2015

As former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush formally launches his White House bid Monday in Miami, his one-time mentee, Marco Rubio, now a Republican primary threat, issued a statement of good will on Bush's entry into the race—a rarity in presidential campaign politics.

"In politics, people throw around the word 'friend' so much it often has little real meaning. This is not one of those times. When I call Jeb Bush my friend, I mean he is someone I like, care for and respect" Rubio said.

"He and I have worked closely together for many years, on issues big and small. He is a passionate advocate for what he believes, and I welcome him to the race, "Rubio added.

By Rubio's own admission, Bush was a significant influence on the U.S. senator, ever since he first became a rising GOP star after being elevated to speaker of the Florida House, and Bush was finishing his 2nd term as a popular governor of the Sunshine state.

Bush even gave him a sabre as gift when he became speaker in 2005.

"I'm going to bestow to you the sword of a great conservative warrior," Bush told Rubio then, according to a local report. Rubio took the sword, dubbed the "Sword of Chang" by Bush, and waved it like a torch.

In his 2012 book, "American Son," Rubio described his admiration for Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I was most influenced by the creativity and daring of Governor Jeb Bush," Rubio wrote. "A one-man idea factory."

Rubio described him as "the man he admired most in Florida politics."

In April, Rubio launched his presidential campaign in The Magic City, across a placid Biscayne Bay.

"Before us now is the opportunity to author the greatest chapter yet in the amazing story of America. We can't do that by going back to the leaders and ideas of the past," Rubio said to the cheering crowd of thousands, many Latino, at the iconic Freedom Tower in downtown Miami. His words, an implied jab at not only the Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, also seemed at directed at Bush.

Bush allies have indicated privately to Fox News that the Bush campaign will have to go after Rubio, in an effort to deflate some of the growth Rubio has gained in the last few weeks as the Cuban-American solidifies himself with Bush, Walker and a couple of other rivals near the top of most recent GOP polls.

And the competition for supporters and donors is on, especially in Florida, where the March 15th primary will be a significant battle ground for each campaign. The Bush campaign released a statement last week that they had picked up three key supporters from Rubio's home turf.

Three Republican, Cuban-American members of Congress in South Florida, including U.S. Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a close ally of Rubio (Rubio had even interned for her at one point) – have all endorsed Bush.

But on Monday morning, after the Bush campaign released a well-produced video with a theme of optimism and positivity, the good will was returned on Twitter by Rubio's former mentor.

"Thanks Marco," Jeb Bush tweeted. "Glad I can do it in our hometown. See you out there!"

Sen. Marco Rubio: Under Obama the World Has Become a More Dangerous Place // TIME // Marco Rubio – June 15, 2015

A major challenge for the next president will be to fix our weakened intelligence system

In February 2011, I stepped into my first classified briefing as a member of the Senate's intelligence committee. The focus that day was on the Arab Spring that had begun to unfold in North Africa, and part of the Monday morning quarterbacking that day was about what more our intelligence community could have done—or what resources they needed—to better anticipate such a consequential turn of events. Those would be the first of hundreds of hours I would spend over the next four and a half years overseeing our nation's intelligence services and programs, and regularly considering what more we can be doing to equip our intelligence services with the tools they need to keep us safe.

During this period, I've seen the consequences that President Barack Obama's foreign policy has had on the world and our interests abroad. Under his leadership, the world has become a more dangerous place, our allies doubt whether America is still a nation of its word when it comes to our security commitments, and we've embarked on a dangerous unilateral disarmament of intelligence-gathering tools through policy reversals from the White House and mindless budget cuts due to sequestration.

This month, the Obama administration will begin the process of dismantling one such program that has helped to keep our people safe since the 9/11 terrorist attacks. This so-called "Section 215 metadata program" authorized by the Patriot Act, which was closely overseen by Congress and the courts for more than a decade, has allowed us to thwart terrorist plots.

Contrary to the popularly accepted lie that this program allowed the U.S. government to spy on Americans and listen in on their phone calls, it simply enabled business records to be collected by phone companies and stored by the National Security Agency in a database that could be checked only when there was a known or suspected terrorist nexus. This program received rigorous oversight from Congress and the judiciary.

Unfortunately, misinformation, fear-mongering and the allure of campaign fundraising all contributed to its expiration, its explicit prohibition in the future, and its replacement with a weaker and untested system that fails to require phone companies to maintain records that we may one day need to track terrorists. Rather than use what power remains in his bully pulpit, President Obama opted to be a bystander and let this program be killed, even though he had previously championed it. Even worse, the White House clearly sent the message to the heads of the intelligence agencies that they needed to stand down from advocating for the program. As a result, the American people are now less safe.

Treating terrorism like a purely law enforcement function and returning our intelligence community to a pre-9/11 footing needlessly exposes the American people to the dangers of a radically changed and more dangerous world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A major challenge for the next president will be to fix the weakened intelligence system that the current one is leaving behind.

This will entail re-equipping our intelligence community with the authorities to quickly connect the dots between terrorist conspirators and ensure the intelligence community has the ability and tools to efficiently narrow the focus of an investigation to uncover plots and save valuable time and resources in the course of terrorist investigations in which time is absolutely of the essence.

With the right tools and a dedicated workforce, we can protect our people and our homeland from another terrorist attack while remaining true to our identity as the freest nation on earth. This belief is not based on a theory, on a campaign briefing, or on something I read in a book or newspaper. It's based on four and a half years of seeing the results with my own eyes.

We need clear leadership from the commander-in-chief to confront the myriad of national security challenges facing the nation. It is increasingly clear that the task of ensuring that those we entrust to protect us have every tool they need for the job will fall to the next president. It is also apparent that through their demagoguery on this issue, through their support for abandoning these crucial programs or through their outright silence that some who aspire to that office are not up to the challenge any more than President Obama is. There is no duty more important than rising to this challenge because Americans lives are on the line.

PAUL

Rand Paul: Obamatrade Tax Hikes on Small Businesses Mean Republicans Should Oppose Revival Efforts // Breitbart // Matthew Boyle – June 15, 2015

Paul said when asked to react to an article from Breitbart News from late Sunday evening exposing the tax increase in the deal:

You know typically to pass these kinds of things, the establishment will try to buy off Democrats by sprinkling money so they have some money in there. To get the money, under our budget rules, we have to pay for it—so they want to pay for it with a fine on small businesses. But I thought a point that was made in the article which was pretty good is this is similar to the fines they wanted to do in Obamacare with 1099s and there was such an outcry it's the only part of Obamacare we ever repealed. So I think when people discover they're sticking a tax increase in there I think people will be even more unhappy.

Paul said he recommends all Republicans vote against TAA when Ryan and House GOP leadership bring it back up on Tuesday for an attempt to revive it after it embarrassingly failed 302-126 when they tried to pass TAA last week in the House. To send Trade Promotion Authority (TPA) to President Obama's desk, TPA and TAA have to pass as a package. A bipartisan coalition formed to take down TAA last week, therefore temporarily killing Obamatrade as a whole—but House GOP leadership, at Ryan's insistence, is going to try to change the game and pass TAA again on Tuesday despite the fact it raises taxes on small business.

Leadership didn't tell any of the members—including the 86 Republicans who voted for TAA last week—that they put the tax increase in the deal, so most of them who voted for it had no idea they were voting to violate a pledge they all made to Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform. That's largely because leadership was so dead-set on trying to convince rank-and-file Republicans to grant Obama fast-track authority under TPA—so that Obama can speed through at least three highly secretive trade deals, the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP), Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (T-TIP), and Trade in Services Agreement (TiSA)—because the donor class wants open borders trade so badly. Most members who support TPA didn't even read the TPP text because it's kept in a secretive room in the Capitol basement and only members can go in to read it—and they're only allowed to, in certain instances, bring staffers with high enough security clearances with them. TiSA and T-TIP text is not even available for members to read, so there's actually no way any member of Congress who supported TPA can know what it was they were actually voting for.

Paul told Breitbart News:

We borrow a million dollars a minute, so the first question I'd ask is where is the money coming from? They have a pay-for in there, but is it really a real pay-for? A lot of these pay-fors are basically set, they stick them on there as accounting gimmicks to say they're going to pay for the money somehow. But the bottom line is they want to raise some kind of fees or fines through the IRS to get money from certain industries, so I'd say that and that this trade deal is secret, and I don't want to give President Obama any more power.

Paul said he expects the issue of Obamatrade to be a big deal on the 2016 campaign trail. It's already separated the field as Paul, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Donald Trump, Carly Fiorina, former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and more oppose it. Sens. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX)93%, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) 80% and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) 47%

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(R-FL)–and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush—among others support it.

"Everywhere I go, people come up to me and say 'thank you for not giving the president more power' 'thank you for voting against TPA,'" Paul said. "So I think it does resonate with people, and we'll see how these things shake out, but it fits my message, because I've been saying we gave the president too much power, and he's tried to grab too much power on immigration, healthcare, war power and now really with trade. Part of the checks and balances is having equal amounts of power with each branch of government can jealously guard their power and I think it's a mistake to give too much power to the president. That's why their decision to make the treaty classified makes me suspicious—when people are not allowed to read it."

WALKER

UK's David Cameron fact-checks Scott Walker // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 15, 2015

At major gatherings of world leaders, President Obama tends to be one of the more popular, sought-after figures on the global stage. This has been common throughout Obama's presidency – he may be seen as a divisive leader domestically, but internationally, Obama is generally a towering figure.
Republicans are heavily invested in believing the opposite. Indeed, one of the more common GOP criticisms of the president is that Obama simply isn't respected abroad. Republicans routinely insist that, behind the scenes, international officials voice their deep disappointment with the U.S. president, all evidence to the contrary notwithstanding.
Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) actually got specific on this point on Friday, saying that British Prime Minister David Cameron told the far-right governor directly that he's unsatisfied with American leadership. Time reported:

Walker, who has taken several trips overseas in recent months to study up on foreign policy in preparation for an all-but-certain presidential bid, told a roomful of Republican donors Friday that world leaders, including Cameron, are worried about the U.S. stepping back in the world. [...]
"I heard that from David Cameron back in February earlier when we were over at 10 Downing," Walker said. "I heard it from other leaders around the world. They're looking around realizing this lead from behind mentality just doesn't work. It's just not working."

If true, this would be a break with diplomatic protocol and a legitimately big deal. It's unpersuasive when GOP leaders run around telling voters, "Lots of foreign leaders don't like Obama; we just can't actually name any." But here's Walker saying the British prime minister personally told him that he's unsatisfied with Obama's leadership.
The problem, not surprisingly, is that Cameron quickly pushed back, suggesting the Wisconsinite, who's repeatedly struggled with foreign policy, has no idea what he's talking about.
"The Prime Minister did not say that and does not think that," a Cameron spokesperson told Time.
Congratulations, governor, on your latest foreign-policy triumph.
Incidentally, this isn't the first time Cameron has felt the need to fact-check the right from across the pond. In January, Fox News' Steven Emerson told a national television audience that the population of Birmingham, England, is now "totally Muslim," and has become a city where "non-Muslims just simply don't go."
Emerson added, "[P]arts of London, there are actually Muslim religious police that actually beat and actually wound seriously anyone who doesn't dress according to religious Muslim attire."
Cameron, asked for a comment, said, "[T]his guy is clearly a complete idiot."
The prime minister didn't go nearly as far when correcting Walker.

Supreme Court shuts down Scott Walker: T oday's ultrasound decision is a big defeat for anti-choice warriors // Salon // Katie McDonough – June 15, 2015

The Supreme Court on Monday declined to review North Carolina's forced ultrasound law, rendering it unenforceable and marking a rare bit of good news about reproductive freedom to come out of the high court. (This time last year, I was in the midst of a prolonged Charlie Brown sad walk over Hobby Lobby and buffer zones.)

This is the end of the road for the state's condescendingly-titled A Woman's Right to Know Act, which was challenged by a coalition of groups on First Amendment grounds. The law required doctors to give patients seeking abortion care detailed descriptions of their ultrasounds and follow a script that, according to a lower court ruling striking down the law, had an "ideological message in favor of carrying a pregnancy to term."

A woman could avert her eyes from the ultrasound screen or plug up her ears to avoid hearing the script, but doctors were legally required to keep going or risk losing their license.

It was a particularly draconian bit of compelled speech forced on patients in a particularly vulnerable position (half naked on an exam table, hours before a medical procedure), which is why it was blocked last year by a panel of judges on the Fourth Circuit. That court's ruling gives some useful context for the severity of the law as it compares to other informed consent laws, so it's worth including here:

Informed consent frequently consists of a fully-clothed conversation between the patient and physician, often in the physician's office. It is driven by the "patient's particular needs and circumstances" ... so that the patient receives the information he or she wants in a setting that promotes an informed and thoughtful choice. This provision, however, finds the patient half-naked or disrobed on her back on an examination table, with an ultrasound probe either on her belly or inserted into her vagina... Informed consent has not generally been thought to require a patient to view images from his or her own body much less in a setting in which personal judgment may be altered or impaired. Yet this provision requires that she do so or "avert her eyes."

Rather than engaging in a conversation calculated to inform, the physician must continue talking regardless of whether the patient is listening... The information is provided irrespective of the needs or wants of the patient, in direct contravention of medical ethics and the principle of patient autonomy. Forcing this experience on a patient over her objections in this manner interferes with the decision of a patient not to receive information that could make an indescribably difficult decision even more traumatic and could "actually cause harm to the patient." ... And it is intended to convey not the risks and benefits of the medical procedure to the patient's own health, but rather the full weight of the state's moral condemnation.

There are currently 10 states with mandatory ultrasound laws. One of them is Wisconsin. Here's how rumored Republican presidential hopeful Scott Walker described his own state's forced ultrasound law:

I'll give you an example. I'm pro-life, I've passed pro-life legislation. We defunded Planned Parenthood, we signed a law that requires an ultrasound. Which, the thing about that, the media tried to make that sound like that was a crazy idea. Most people I talk to, whether they're pro-life or not, I find people all the time who'll get out their iPhone and show me a picture of their grandkids' ultrasound and how excited they are, so that's a lovely thing. I think about my sons are 19 and 20, you know we still have their first ultrasound picture. It's just a cool thing out there.

We just knew if we signed that law, if we provided the information, that more people if they saw that unborn child would, would make a decision to protect and keep the life of that unborn child.

Walker may think forced ultrasounds are "cool," but he's wrong about the impact of such laws. As I've written before, forced ultrasound laws don't change women's minds about abortion, they just make the procedure more expensive — and potentially more traumatizing as women feel judged and condemned by a script the state forced into their doctors' mouths.

Scott Walker Already Failing At Diplomacy // Blue Nation Review // Jesse Berney – June 15, 2015

One of the most entertaining parts of presidential campaigns is watching governors take trips overseas to boost their foreign policy cred. Sooner or later, they always get into trouble, like when Mitt Romney insulted London's preparations for the Olympics during a 2012 trip.

Wisconsin Governor and imminent presidential candidate Scott Walker traveled to Britain in February and met with Prime Minister David Cameron, and has been using the experience to bolster his claim that President Obama is not so great with the foreign policy.

The only problem? According to Cameron, Walker is lying.

Walker has claimed world leaders, including Cameron, have told him President Obama's "lead from behind" polices are "just not working."

But a spokesman for Cameron told TIME, "The Prime Minister did not say that and does not think that."

Oops.

There are two possibilities here. Walker is telling the truth, and Cameron (reportedly one of Obama's closest allies among world leaders) is trashing Obama in private discussions with other American politicians. If that unlikely scenario is true, then Walker embarrassed himself by publicly revealing a private conversation with Cameron.
Or Walker is simply lying about what the prime minister of Great Britain told him.
Either way, it's clear Walker has a lot to learn before he engages in actual diplomacy with actual consequences for the United States. Or maybe it's best he just stays away from offices with responsibility over our foreign policies — like the presidency.

Ted Cruz courts Houston business elite at private luncheon // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 15, 2015

Ted Cruz wooed his hometown's business elite Monday at a closed-door luncheon in Houston, the latest outreach by Cruz to a local community still somewhat uneasy with the Tea Party firebrand.

Cruz met with the guests and members of Houston's C Club, a conservative group that brings together 100 of the city's movers and shakers, including several prominent presidential donors. As Cruz prepared to run for president in 2013 and 2014, he looked to smooth over relations with the potential contributors in Houston who were squarely behind David Dewhurst, the Texas lieutenant governor who lost in an upset to Cruz in 2012.

As he frequently does in interviews and more intimate settings, the Texas senator gave a detailed explanation of how he could win the Republican nomination. Chief among his selling points, attendees said, was his early fundraising success: Cruz raised more than $4 million during the first 9 days of the campaign, and the cluster of super PACs independently supporting his bid claim to have raised more than $37 million.

Cruz at times sounded like a political operative as he walked through the numbers he needed to win, said George Strake Jr., a prominent Houston businessman supporting Cruz.

"I told him after the speech that would be better than you being the candidate would be you being the campaign manager for another candidate," Strake joked.

The C Club did endorse Cruz during that 2012 primary, and the Texas senator remains popular on the whole with Texas Republicans. But some in the business community soured on him after a Cruz-led group triggered a partial government shutdown in fall 2013.

Cruz spoke for about 45 minutes to the group on a day when much of the attention may have been placed on the city's other favorite son: Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor who grew up in Houston and announced his presidential bid later that afternoon in Miami.

Jeb Bush's Son Once Called Ted Cruz The "Future Of The Republican Party" // Buzzfeed // Megan Apper – June 15, 2015

George P. Bush, the Texas Land Commissioner and son of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, once called Senator Ted Cruz "the future of the Republican Party" and compared Cruz's effect on the party to the "Great Reformation."

"Ted is the future of the Republican Party," Bush said in a statement in support for Cruz during the 2012 Texas Republican Senate primary. Cruz, an upstart conservative and grassroots candidate, ultimately came from behind in that race to upset Texas lieutenant governor David Dewhurst, the establishment favorite.

"He is a proven conservative, and his personal story embodies the American Dream. Like Marco Rubio in Florida, I am confident that Ted will inspire a new generation of leaders to stand up and defend American Exceptionalism."

Speaking with the Texas Tribune about his 2013 campaign for land commissioner, Bush said his goal was to follow Cruz's playbook.

"Our idea is to take a page out of Ted Cruz's playbook and engage the grassroots and the activists within the party throughout the state," Bush said.

In that interview, Bush compared the effect candidates like Ted Cruz had on the party to the Great Reformation.

"I analogize it to the Great Reformation, where you have outside forces that reform a body or an institution," Bush said. "I think there are definitely some positive effects that are taking place within the party because of the Tea Party, increased grassroots activism, increased attention and concerns with respect to what's happening in Washington,D.C"
The young Bush told the Texas Tribune in September 2014 that Cruz was a "force of nature" and "fearless."

"I think he has been a forceful advocate for the issues that we talked about today on Obamacare and now increasingly on the international stage," said Bush. "But you know he is a force of nature on the conservative side and he's fearless. And honestly there are a lot of folks who are hungry for that type of challenge in Washington DC. And so we still exchange texts here and there you know, obviously we will help him with whatever he needs.
Asked about his past statements on Cruz by the Tribune, Bush said "I'm not going to endorse."

Asked about his dad, he said, "I think folks know that I love him."

New Jersey Lawmakers' Plan To Circumvent Chris Christie, Start Automatic Voter Registration // Think Progress // Kira Lerner – June 15, 2015

After Hillary Clinton delivered a speech earlier this month calling for the restoration and expansion of voting rights across the country, likely Republican presidential candidate and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie was quick to respond. "I don't want to expand [early voting] and increase the opportunities for fraud," he said, adding that "maybe that's what Mrs. Clinton wants to do."

While Christie has made it clear he would not support legislation to expand voting opportunities, his Democrat-controlled legislature is moving forward with it anyway. Democratic leaders plan to introduce and fast-track the "Democracy Act" this week which would make it the second state to adopt automatic voter registration and would expand early voting opportunities, among other changes.

"We're not reinventing the wheel" said Analilia Mejia, the director of New Jersey Working Families, which spearheaded the initiative to have lawmakers introduce the legislation. "Most of these things have been moved and adopted in other states successfully... It's just mind-bending that a governor of a state would be against every single one of his citizens having full ease and access to participate in the voting process."
Christie asserted last week that Clinton "doesn't know what she was talking about" when it comes to voting in New Jersey, but Mejia said "she totally does, otherwise New Jersey wouldn't be 39th in the country in participation and registration. We wouldn't be behind Mississippi."

New Jersey currently ranks 39th in the country in both percentage of eligible voters who are registered and percentage of voters who actually case a ballot, according to NJWF. The state does not allow in-person early voting, but requires citizens who want to cast an absentee ballot early to apply for one at an election official's office. New Jersey also does not permit online voter registration, something that is allowed in 33 other states.
The package of legislation will also include a bill that would ban governors from calling costly special elections, like the Senate race Christie ordered in 2013 which cost the state roughly $24 million. Around the same time Christie decided to spend millions of valuable taxpayer dollars on the special election, a move critics said he made in order to preserve his own seat, he vetoed a bill that would have let citizens vote 14 days before an election, calling the $25 million measure "hasty" and "counterproductive." Meanwhile, Clinton has called for a minimum 20 days of early voting in each state.

The Democracy Act would also solve another problem plaguing New Jersey elections — the need to accommodate non-English speakers. Currently materials only have to be printed in Spanish if 10 percent of the county or voting districts speaks it as their primary language, but the bill would require election materials to be made available to voters in multiple languages without other stipulations, according to NJ Advance Media.
"It's no wonder that our 21st century electorate is disengaged when our voting practices are stuck in the 17th century," Frank Argote-Freyre, president of the Latino Action Network, said in a statement. "By modernizing voter registration practices and ensuring ballot materials are translated into languages that reflect our communities, we can dramatically improve voter accessibility and engagement."

Mejia said that if Christie vetoes the bill, as NJWF expects him to do, the group plans to bring the issue directly to the voters on the next ballot. The move wouldn't be unique for New Jersey voters — most notably, they previously acted without the governor's support to raise the minimum wage through a constitutional amendment.

Chris Christie Used a Phrase to Describe the Fight Against ISIS That Brings George W. Bush to Mind // IJ Review // Mallory Shelbourne – June 15, 2015

During the lead up to the Iraq war, President George W. Bush used the phrase "coalition of the willing" to describe what the U.S. would assemble to defeat Iraq's Saddam Hussein if he would not surrender his weapons of mass destruction.

Now Governor Chris Christie is echoing the former president's phrase to describe the fight against ISIS.

According to Reuters, on "This Week" Sunday morning the New Jersey Republican said:

"'Well, listen, you know, we've got to put together a coalition of the willing, which has been used before ... and used successfully in that region,' he said on ABC's 'This Week.'"
In May, Christie told CNN's Jake Tapper that knowing what we know now, invading Iraq was not the right choice. Politico reported:

"'I think President Bush made the best decision he could at the time, given that his intelligence community was telling him that there was WMD and that there were other threats right there in Iraq,' Christie continued. 'But I don't think you could honestly say that if we knew then that there was no WMD that the country should have gone to war.'"

Bush's own brother, presidential hopeful and former Governor Jeb Bush, struggled with the same question in May. The Florida Republican also had a heated exchange with a college student during a town-hall discussion in May over whether or not his brother's administration created ISIS.

PERRY

Perry inexplicably blasts Obama's 'lack of executive experience' // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 15, 2015

We can apparently add former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) to the list of Republicans who don't fully understand the military offensive President Obama has launched against ISIS targets in the Middle East. Right Wing Watch reported the other day:

Former Texas governor and GOP presidential candidate Rick Perry told conservative talk radio host Dana Loesch on Wednesday that President Obama hasn't shown any "engagement to stop ISIS," which he attributed to the president's "lack of being able to really connect the dots" and "lack of executive experience." [...]
"I think that's the reason ISIS has gone forward, I think that's the reason Putin is standing there basically laughing at us as we have one lack of impact after another in the global world that we're living in," he said.
The Republican presidential candidate, currently under criminal indictment, added that Syria paid no price for crossing the "red line" established by the Obama administration.
I'll admit, criticizing Obama's "lack of executive experience" continues to be an unintentionally funny line of attack. In 2008, it was a legitimate area of interest (though Obama's general-election rival had exactly as much executive experience as he did), but in 2015, it's pretty silly.
After all, the first word in the phrase "President Obama" is "president." Obama doesn't "lack of executive experience"; he's led the executive branch during a time of war and economic crisis. He has the kind of executive experience few can even try to relate to.
As for whether or not Vladimir Putin is "laughing at" the United States, he's really not. Worse yet, when Perry says Syria paid no price, that's plainly false, too.
But perhaps most striking of all is Perry's belief that Obama hasn't shown any "engagement to stop ISIS." The former governor may have missed the news, but the U.S. president has launched thousands of airstrikes against ISIS targets and helped assemble an international coalition to confront the militants.
Perry's Republican allies on Capitol Hill haven't been willing to do any actual work on the issue – GOP lawmakers just haven't shown any "engagement to stop ISIS" – but Obama's been quite engaged, indeed.
Of course, if it were just Perry who made odd comments like these, it'd be easier to dismiss. It wouldn't be the first time the far-right Texan seemed confused by current events.
But as we've discussed before, there's actually an astounding number of Republican lawmakers and politicians, from state legislatures to the congressional leadership to the presidential trail, who've argued repeatedly in recent months that President Obama hasn't "done anything about ISIS."
Given the scope of the military offensive launched by the Obama administration, the rhetoric seems oddly delusional.

Perry, Rubio mock Hillary Clinton in new campaign ads // Yahoo News // Caitlin Dickson – June 15, 2015

The 2016 presidential election is still 17 months away, but some primary candidates are already getting a jumpstart on their general election attack ads.

Over the weekend, former Texas governor Rick Perry and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) both released campaign ads targeting Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination.

The video from Perry's camp, titled "Hillary Goes to the Movies," shows silhouetted cartoon Clinton pulling up to a movie theater in a van — presumably a reference to Clinton's heavily-hyped ride, which was spotted occupying a handicapped spot, on her road trip from New York to Iowa at the start of her campaign back in April. A film called "Stop Hillary Clinton" is playing, and a recording of Clinton's actual laughter plays on loop as the cartoon version watches the "previews of upcoming attractions," a compilation of controversies involving the former secretary of state.

The Hillary in Rubio's ad, on the other hand, is straight out real life — and almost real time.

The video, released on Saturday, shows Clinton speaking at her New York City campaign rally just hours earlier. Playing through an old-fashioned TV, however, the fresh clip of Clinton deriding the current Republican primary field looks like archival footage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The video switches from a grainy Clinton, reciting the lyrics to the Beatles' "Yesterday," which she called the Republican theme song, to Rubio in high-definition.

"Yesterday is over," Rubio says to a cheering crowd, many of them recording videos on their iPhones. "And we're never going back."

The ad contrasts Rubio as a fresh face against political dynasties like the Clintons and — though fellow Republican candidate Jeb Bush is not mentioned — the Bushes.

"We Americans are proud of our history, but our country has always been about the future," Rubio says in the video. "Before us now is the opportunity to author the greatest chapter yet in the amazing story of America. But we can't do that by going back to the leaders and the ideas of the past."

Clinton has hardly refrained from taking shots against the GOP field as a whole. But she's also become the target of many Republican primary candidates months before Democrats are ready to focus on any one of her opponents. Rand Paul's campaign store even has a whole section dedicated to anti-Hillary merchandise. Perry's and Rubio's videos are a taste of what's to come from both sides as the primary season progresses.

Rick Perry rates himself against Bush, Cruz // Dallas Daily News – June 15, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry's officially kicked off his second bid for the White House two weeks ago at an airplane hangar in Addison. On Monday, as fellow Republican Jeb Bush joined the dozen-plus candidates in the field, Perry appeared on The Mark Davis Show on KSKY-AM (660) to talk about the campaign and the ever-growing chorus of contenders.

Here are some excerpts from that interview, as conducted and condensed by Mark Davis:

So what's been happening since the Addison rollout?

It was an extremely well-put-together rollout. It's always fun to stand in front of an old C-130 Hercules, so we were able to round one up, and remind people that freedom's not free. On the stage were a lot of people who paid an extraordinary price — Taya Kyle, and Marcus and Morgan Luttrell and others ... just a great backdrop to talk about this country we live in. It's wonderful, it's extraordinary, but it costs a great deal to keep those freedoms. We went from there to Iowa, on Saturday we did a motorcycle rally ... ended up in New Hampshire, then into South Carolina, then back into Texas for Wednesday and Thursday of this last week. So, headed off to do a big round in Texas the next four or five days. A lot of great crowds, a lot of excitement out there. I'm blessed, happy, healthy and prepared.

Every Republican will be out there suggesting he will be a better leader for the military. You focus a lot on your actual service.

Obviously, the people who are in office now or who are running for office on the other side, you have to look at this as a third term for Barack Obama. With Hillary Clinton, there's no way around that. She owns the foreign policy debacle that came out of Libya and Syria, so that is not a high hurdle for any of the men and women on our side. But I think it is very important to not only have worn the uniform of our country, but to have been in a position like I've been in for the last 14 years, as the commander in chief of the Texas military forces — that's executive experience, and that's military experience that is priceless, and there's only one way you can get it.

You had an interesting line in your announcement speech, saying leadership is not a speech delivered on the Senate floor. Seems like that's aimed toward four or five guys.

Listen, we have some extraordinarily brilliant, capable United States Senators running in this race. I mean Ted Cruz, I like him a lot. Ted is a smart, capable — but I mean, after eight years of this young, inexperienced United States senator, this President, and that lack of experience, ... it's going to be a hard, hard thing for Republican primary voters to say, "We're going to take a chance on that."

Jeb Bush was a Governor. How do you view his entry?

Good man, good family. But again, let's look at the records. Look at [my] 14 years of an environment of creating jobs — no one can touch Texas ... We're now the No. 1 total exporting state and have been for the last 13 years. We're the No. 1 high-tech exporting state. The job creation climate — during the worst recession the country has had since the Great Depression. Listen, if you weren't creating jobs back in the late '90s, early 2000s, then you weren't paying attention.

What's the President Perry answer to Obamacare?

You push the bulk of it back to the states. We've said that from the get-go. I'm a true believer in the 10th

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Amendment. I don't just give it lip service, I believe in it. When they tried to force No Child Left Behind on us in Texas, when they tried to force Race to the Top, Common Core … being able to push these issues back to the states, I trust Governors, legislators, working with their citizens to come up with better ways to deliver health care. … "If you want to keep your doctor, you can keep him." Well, no. "We're going to drive down the cost of health care." Well, no. All of those things they said about Obamacare did not come true, and now we're finding that not only does it most likely have a constitutional error in it that's going to be fatal — I hope states are looking at different ways, whether it's health savings accounts, whether it's a host of menus that people can pick and choose from. States will deliver health care more efficiently and, I know, at a cheaper rate than what you'll see Washington, D.C. do.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham telling it like it is // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 15, 2015

Jeb Bush has said he wants to run with joy in his heart. Right now the most joyous candidate may be a long shot — or perhaps he can be joyous because he is a long shot. Either way, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), already known as a wit, is becoming the truthteller in the race. With bluntness and humor, he is holding nothing back and in the process doing a fine job of debunking foolish people and foolish ideas.

It's no secret that the Pentagon can be risk-averse. Under George W. Bush, inspiration and support for the Iraq surge had to come from outside the military brass. More recently, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Martin E. Dempsey drove informed senators and outside experts to distraction by raising a host of objections and a parade of horribles for not acting years ago in Syria — when the risks actually were low and the chance for success was high. So it surprised none of Dempsey's critics when word came that he didn't favor a more robust strategy for fighting the Islamic State. That provoked the following reaction from Graham, appearing on "Face the Nation": "So, now would be a good time to call Ash Carter and our military leaders to the Capitol Hill and say, if you have got a problem with what we're doing, let me know, but tell me how this is working, because if our military leadership thinks that we're on a path to degrading and destroying ISIL, they need to be fired." Exactly.

Graham also made plenty of sense explaining how we got into the mess we are in:

[JOHN] DICKERSON: The secretary of defense, in some blunt remarks, said Iraqi army is not really up to the task.

This has been a repeated story, so why, if you add 10,000 advisers, are you not just sending good after bad here?

GRAHAM: Well, the surge did work.

In 2011, we had security in Iraq, political progress. If you don't believe me, listen to President Obama in 2012. General Keane is the guy I have been listening to, who was the architect of the surge. If you have 10,000 Americans train and advise and assist at the battalion level, it would help Iraqi army be tougher.

It you had a couple of aviation battalions of American attack helicopters, you would have a distinct advantage over ISIL in Syria, in Iraq. But you have to look at Syria and Iraq as one battle space. We're not doing the. We have no strategy to deal with the Iraqi safe havens in Syria. You cannot win this war from the air.

Obama will go before Assad will go. So, this whole policy toward degrading and destroying ISIL is miserable failure. And when Secretary Clinton said that this country was well-positioned to deal with the threats from ISIL, Iran, Russia, and China, she is absolutely delusional.

We're in a bad position against all the threats we face, because Barack Obama has been a weak and indecisive commander in chief. And she would be the third term of a failed presidency. We better do something different.

And he might have added that senators on the right and left who cheered total withdrawal from Iraq and refused to recognize a national security interest in Syria share the responsibility for our current predicament. In the campaign, if New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie insists as he did on ABC News on Sunday that he doesn't "believe now the idea of putting 10,000 troops on the ground is what we need to do," or Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) insists contrary to all evidence we can win the war by dropping more bombs (Targeted where? And when did airpower alone win a war against an asymmetric, fundamentalist foe?) or Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) proclaims that the problem is too much U.S. engagement, I certainly expect Graham to be ready with a zinger. And speaking of Rand Paul, Graham had the nerve to say what virtually all foreign policy conservatives believe (albeit quietly), namely that Hillary Clinton would be a worse commander in chief than any GOP candidate "except for Rand Paul."

Graham is also a truthteller on immigration reform. "Mitt Romney and Ann Romney did our party a great service by admitting that embracing self-deportation in 2012 was their biggest mistake. . . .You're not going to self-deport

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

11 million people. You're not going to be able to do that. I'm not going to be a Republican nominee wanting to try to do that. If you pass a criminal background check, I will allow to you stay here legally and earn your way to citizenship. It will be hard-earned pathway. But I hope every candidate on the Republican side will follow Mitt Romney's lead and admit it was a mistake to embrace self-deportation. And I hope self-deportation is in our rear-view mirror as a party, because if it is not, we will lose in 2016." As for those peddling in fears about legal immigrants, Graham was equally cutting: "To me, they're just looking in a different world than I am. We will be down to two workers for every retiree in the next 20 years. We're going to need more legal immigration. And I hope we will embrace a comprehensive approach that is realistic and humane."

And finally, in his lighthearted dismissal of the infatuation with first ladies, he makes no bones about the fact that the republic will do fine without an unelected White House fixture, a sort of royal consort (an expensive one at that) more appropriate for a monarchy than the United States. He joked: "The last time I checked, there was nothing in the Constitution or at the White House [that] said single people need not apply. I'm going to be a ready-to-go commander in chief, protect everybody, single people included." Good for him.

Both Graham and Ohio Gov. John Kasich benefit from candor and lack of concern for the ire they stir in the GOP. While Graham refuses to give way to those peddling snake oil on the Islamic State or immigration or feigning horror about the absence of a hostess-in-chief, Kasich pesters Republicans to embrace the poor, disabled, drug-addicted and other overlooked Americans. Neither especially cares what his right-wing critics say. So while they both can infuriate some on the right (especially in conservative media), their irreverence and intolerance of cant make them two of the most interesting and essential participants in the 2016 presidential race.

The power players behind Lindsey Graham's campaign // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 15, 2015

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, who so far has hardly registered in the polls, entered the presidential race in early June on a platform of strong national security, entitlement reform and bipartisan cooperation at home. His close ally, fellow foreign policy hawk Sen. John McCain, has been a major Graham booster, and several McCain alums are helping Graham's effort, along with operatives who are longtime Graham loyalists. Graham is in his third term as a U.S. senator, winning reelection last year over the objections of tea party activists in his state, who disagreed with his collaboration with Democrats on immigration reform, among other issues.

The senator is considered a long-shot to win the GOP nomination, but he is popular among his fellow senators, and several presidential candidates and their allies have gone out of their way to praise him. Graham could also play an important role in pushing fellow 2016ers further to the right on national security issues. Here's a look at the key players in Graham's orbit, with more to come as he staffs up:

• Christian Ferry is campaign manager. Ferry, a GOP operative, served as deputy campaign manager of McCain's 2008 presidential campaign, and also worked on his unsuccessful 2000 primary bid. He has worked on political and business campaigns abroad as well.

• Jon Seaton is a senior adviser. He's a veteran Republican operative who served as former Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty's national political director during the last presidential primary, and also held a number of positions on McCain's 2008 presidential bid, including national field director and regional campaign manager for Ohio and Pennsylvania.

• Brittany Bramell is the Graham campaign's spokeswoman, who also serves in a senior communications role. She's a former spokeswoman for House Speaker John Boehner.
• Scott Farmer is a senior adviser to Graham. He served as Graham's campaign manager in 2014 and 2008 and is a veteran of the senator's political shop.

• Rachael Leman is policy director. She spent 10 years in Congress working on the House Rules Committtee.

• David Wilkins is national finance chairman. Wilkins was nominated to serve as U.S. ambassador to Canada under President George W. Bush, something he did from 2005-2009. He's also a prominent South Carolina lawyer. He is head of a national finance committee that includes prominent donors such as businessman and cosmetics mogul Ronald Perelman and General Electric head Jeff Immelt.

• Paul Young is advising Graham in New Hampshire. He is a longtime Granite State operative who has advised several presidential campaigns, including McCain's, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry's and former Sen. Bob Dole's, among others.

• Tracie Gibler is Graham's Iowa state director. She is well-connected in conservative circles as a former chief of staff to Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa). She was Pawlenty's political director during the last presidential election.

• Shell Suber is running political efforts in South Carolina. He is a longtime Palmetto State operative and served as political director for Graham's 2008 campaign.

SUPER PAC

The group "Security is Strength" is backing Graham from the outside. Scott T. Ford, a prominent businessman, is co-chairman, along with former Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.). Andrew King, Graham's former deputy chief of staff, is executive director, and Caroline Wren is finance director, a position she held on his Senate race as well. Bill Bethea, a well-known South Carolina attorney, is treasurer.

Are Rumors About Lindsey Graham's Sexuality Hurting His Presidential Chances? // Slate // Mark Joseph Stern – June 15, 2015

Lindsey Graham is a formidable figure in Congress: A third-term Republican senator who also served eight years in the House, Graham is a national security hawk and a foreign policy expert beloved in his home state of South Carolina, despite his occasionally moderate leanings.

Yet ever since Graham formally announced his bid for the Republican presidential nomination, his candidacy has been treated as something of a joke. Thus far, Graham's bachelor status has attracted the most attention. Hispromise to have "a rotating first lady" drew giggles and jokes—including a quip by Sen. Mark Kirk that Graham was a "bro with no ho." Graham then gave a somewhat melancholy interview insisting that being single did not make him a "defective person."at CF
R
Lurking behind the media's fascination with Graham's singlehood is an assumption about his sexuality. Gay rumors have long plagued the senator , and other South Carolina politicians have even implied that Graham is closeted. (Graham has declared that he "ain't gay.") These whispers become shouts on the late-night circuit, where comedians like Jon Stewart and John Oliver earn laughs by ridiculing Graham's ostensibly effeminate mannerisms. Recently, Larry Wilmorefelt compelled to push back against one of his guests, who laughingly stated she thinks Graham is gay. "Here's the thing," Wilmore said:

Wilmore is on to something here. The mainstream media's coverage of Graham's bachelor status may not blatantly hint that the senator is gay—but it doesn't need to. Even in 2015, many Americans still assume that anybody who isn't partnered at a certain age must be homosexual. The fact that Graham talks in a somewhat stereotypically gay voice only makes the assumption more irresistible.
But when Stewart performs his effeminate Graham impression, he isn't just suggesting the senator is gay—he's mocking him for it. That's a problem. Were Graham openly gay, no progressive comedian would dare ridicule him for his manner of speech. Graham is only fair game because he's perceived to be closeted. The implication that he's gay and lying about it is what makes the joke amusing. (That is, if you think it's funny at all.)

It's difficult to draw a direct line between these jeering late-night jibes, the mainstream media's winking coverage of Graham, and the senator's striking unpopularity among GOP voters. (He is currently pollingaround 1 percent, lagging behind train wrecks like Bobby Jindal andRick Santorum .) But it's hard to believe the media's refusal to take Graham seriously isn't having some effect on his terrible numbers. Rather than pressing Graham to explain his apparent support for drone strikes without due process , anchors are forcing him to justify his lack of a wife. Nobody looks presidential when they're anxiously explaining why they're single in their 50s.

If Graham were more traditionally masculine, I seriously doubt he'd be dogged by so many questions about his bachelorhood. The fun of poking Graham about his personal life lies in the ambiguous presentation of his sexuality. Most Republican voters may not currently think Graham is gay. But they'll be all but required to consider that question if Graham's media coverage continues to dwell on his romantic and sexual choices. Graham may well be an awful presidential candidate for the Republican Party. But an analysis of his qualifications shouldn't rest on the giggling assumption that he's stuck in the closet.

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum vs Marriage // HuffPo // Matt Baume – June 15, 2015

With the Supreme Court due to rule on marriage any day now, Presidential "candidate" Rick Santorum says he would fight back against a pro-equality ruling. He says that states allowing gay and lesbian couples to marry is a violation of his religious freedom, which is an argument a lot people made about interracial marriage in the 60s. So do couples need to worry about the possibility that Rick Santorum could stop them from marrying? No. For one thing, the president doesn't get to veto Supreme Court rulings. And for another, Rick Santorum will never be president.

But statements like those give cover to organizations that oppose marriage equality. Last week a group of religious leaders took out an ad in some newspapers saying that they would defy any order from the Supreme Court to recognize marriage equality. Can they do that? No, not really. At most, they can use this as an excuse to gather email addresses on a petition, which is exactly what they're doing. This is the work of Rick Scarborough, who has in the past suggested that someone should file a class action lawsuit against homosexuality, so clearly not one of the country's great legal minds.

Meanwhile, back in reality, a judge in Arkansas ruled this week that the state must recognize marriages performed during a brief window last year when clerks were issuing licenses. And Lambda Legal has filed a new lawsuit in Texas to stop the state from denying spousal benefits to LGBT government employees. Texas is shaping up to be a battleground state when we get a marriage ruling, with some officials doing what they can to resist equality, and others, like the clerk in Dallas, eagerly awaiting the opportunity to marry queer couples.

Also last week, the North Carolina legislature passed a law that allows government officials to opt out of issuing licenses on the basis of their religion. If they opt out, they have to do so for everyone -- gay or straight, they'd have to reject all couples. It's worth pointing out that North Carolina has had marriage equality for over half a year at this point, with no problems. And a new survey shows public support for equality reaching a new high in the state.

That goes along with a new survey from Pew this week, showing support for marriage continuing to do what it's done for the last decade and a half. Nationally, support is averaging somewhere around 57%, with opposition well under 40. And that's the big reason why any attempt to disobey the Supreme Court will be unsuccessful. There just aren't enough people left who oppose the freedom to marry.

HUCKABEE

GOP hopeful Huckabee: My beliefs won't trip me up // CNBC // Matthew Belvedere – June 15, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Mike Huckabee—an ex-Arkansas governor and former Southern Baptist pastor—said Monday he has a proven track record of bringing together diverse people of different backgrounds.

He also disputed the notion that a candidate, like himself, who believes in what he calls "traditional marriage" and opposes abortion cannot win the White House—pointing to the two terms of Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush who shared similar views.

"I think people vote not so much horizontally—whether you're left or right, liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican ... [but] vertically. Do they believe you'll take the country up or down," Huckabee told CNBC's "Squawk Box" in an interview.
Making his case for being someone who can unite the electorate, he said, "Look at how I got 49 percent of the African-American vote in my state ... which historically had only elected three Republicans statewide before I got elected."

On the issue of free trade, Huckabee said he loves the idea of a free market, but he's wary about giving President Barack Obama the fast-track negotiating authority favored by GOP lawmakers and opposed by Democrats.

"I'm a capitalist with a capital 'C,'" he said, but he opposes the evolving Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) agreement in part because of the secrecy surrounding the deal.

The former Arkansas governor said he doesn't know why Republicans want "to give this president who ... sort of defied his ability to make a deal on a secondhand Subaru much less major trade agreements."

On Friday, House Ways and Means Chairman Paul Ryan appeared on "Squawk Box" ahead of key votes on Capitol Hill to advance the process for crafting the TPP. The effort, backed by the Wisconsin Republican and others in his party, failed.

Huckabee said Monday he's concerned about the impact on jobs. "A lot of American workers have taken a gut punch because [past] trade agreements have not been enforced on both sides of the deal. And we've allowed our partners to cheat."

Ben Carson leads crowded GOP field in latest poll // The Detroit Free Press // Alicia Secord – June 15, 2015

In it's latest poll, Monmouth University in West Long Branch, N.J., found that "undecided" has a nine-percentage-point lead among Republican voters when asked who they support for their party's nomination, but native Detroiter Ben Carson rose to the forefront of the crowded field of GOP candidates.

Carson leads the pack with the support of 11% of voters, followed closely by Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker (10%), former Florida Gov. Bush (9%), Florida Sen. Rubio (9%), and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (8%). Other potential picks include Kentucky Senator Rand Paul (6%), Texas Sen. Ted Cruz (5%), New Jersey Governor Chris Christie (4%), former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (4%) and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum (3%). The other candidates in the poll -- businesswoman Carly Fiorina (2%), South Carolina Sen Lindsey Graham (2%), businessman Donald Trump (2%), Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (1%), Ohio Gov. John Kasich (1%), and former New York Gov. George Pataki (0%) -- fall below the top-10 cut-off that will be used by Fox News and CNN to determine who gets an invitation to their debates in August.

The poll was conducted before Bush formally announced his candidacy today.

Carson's standing has increased by 4 points since the last Monmouth poll in April, and "undecided" has gone up by 6 points. Meanwhile, his favorability rating is up to 45% favorable and 12% unfavorable today, up from 39% favorable and 16% unfavorable in the previous poll. But this early in the game, it's hard to say what voters will do when they head to the polls in 2016.

"You would be hard pressed to look at these results and identify an emerging top tier in the Republican field, let alone a so-called front runner," said Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute.

EXCLUSIVE: T rump will declare $9 billion net worth as he reveals 2016 plans // WaPo // Robert Costa & Matea Gold – June 15, 2015

Donald J. Trump, the billionaire real-estate mogul, on Tuesday will release a summary of assets that total about $9 billion as part of his likely entry into the race for the Republican presidential nomination, according to people familiar with his plans.

The two-page document — which will be published after he holds a political rally at Trump Tower in New York — will provide a valuation of his hotels and other properties. It will also show hundreds of millions in cash on hand and an outline of his debt, the people said.

The details he will reveal Tuesday will provide one of the first looks at the worth of the real estate and television empire that the colorful impresario has amassed — one whose value has been avidly debated.

Trump's declared assets are more than double the estimate of his net worth by Forbes, which currently pegs his net holdings at $4.1 billion. And it would make him the wealthiest Republican contender.

Trump's longtime financial advisers and Donald F. McGahn, a partner at Jones Day, have finalized the report about his finances in recent weeks as Trump has moved closer to jumping into the 2016 contest. Three people briefed on those discussions Monday requested anonymity in order to talk about the process.

Trump's speech announcing his decision is likely to center on his career and fortune. He is expected to cast himself as an entrepreneur and outsider eager to tangle with the party establishment and U.S. economic rivals abroad, such as China.

The financial statement drafted by his office is aimed at demonstrating his success as a businessman, as well as proving to skeptical GOP leaders that he is serious about running.

One goal of Trump's camp is to make the cut for the Republican primary debates this summer and fall, which will require him to rank within the top 10 in national polls, among other factors. By divulging details about his finances, Trump believes he will be going above and beyond what will be necessary to win a place on stage, according to people familiar with his thinking.

Fox News, which is producing and airing the first debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland, requires all candidates to have filed "all necessary paperwork with the Federal Election Commission."

The network has not specifically called for contenders to file their financial information before the debate is held. But under a 1978 federal ethics law, presidential candidates must file a personal financial disclosure with the FEC within 30 days after announcing their candidacies. (They can request two 45-day extensions.) The filing must detail their financial interests and income, as well as those of their spouses and dependent children.

Trump plans to file the disclosure within the allotted time, according to people familiar with this plan. He will not be releasing his income tax returns Tuesday, the people said, but he has not ruled out doing so at some point in the coming months.

Earlier this month, Trump told Fox Business Network that he is ready for reporters to scrutinize his holdings. "I've had great success. My statements are phenomenal," he said. "I get my financial statements very early, actually. I put tremendous amounts of people to work, I've negotiated against the best in the world, including countries, and I've come out on top."

Trump also recently made headlines when he told the Des Moines Register that he would be the "most successful person ever to run for president."

"Ross Perot isn't successful like me. Romney was — I have a Gucci store that's worth more money than Romney," Trump said, referencing the fashion mecca on his property on Fifth Avenue in Manhattan.

Trump, now 69, briefly and flamboyantly considered a bid in 2011 before deciding against a run. In New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina — all early voting states —Trump has hired staffers.

Still, Trump's path to the nomination will be rocky and uphill. Many Republicans, especially in the upper ranks of the GOP, see him as a celebrity bomb-thrower and provocateur who has flirted with "birtherism" and made other remarks casting doubt on President Obama's credentials and love of country.

Trump runs at the lower end of the pack of a very large potential set of Republican candidates, ranging from 3 to 5 percent support in national public polls. He is polling at 4 percent among Republicans and Republican-leaning independent voters in a late May Washington Post-ABC News poll.

That puts him behind seasoned Republican politicians like Jeb Bush, Scott Walker, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio (with 10 or 11 percent support each) but also in the same breath as Govs. Chris Christie and John Kasich (6 and 3 percent support).

Trump has insisted that he has sincere intentions. "Everybody feels I'm doing this just to have fun or because it's good for the brand," he said in an interview in February with The Washington Post. "Well, it's not fun. I'm not doing this for enjoyment. I'm doing this because the country is in serious trouble."

In revealing details about his finances, Trump is going further than he has in previous years when he has contemplated White House bids.

His estimated net worth has fluctuated dramatically over the years. In August 2013, Trump said he was worth "probably over $10 billion."

But even the most aggressive auditors have found it challenging to assess Trump's balance sheet, in part because his assets and liabilities are intricately complex, entwined with public subsidies and opaque private partnerships.

Trump has bristled at those who have raised questions about those high estimates of financial standing. He filed a libel suit against a New York Times reporter who wrote in 2005 that the real estate mogul was likely worth between $150 million and $250 million. The case was dismissed.

onald T rum p plans an announcement, and GOP wonders: Presidency or reality TV? // LA T im es // Kathleen Hennessey - June 16, 2015

As Donald Trump prepares to announce his plans, the reality TV aspect of the GOP presidential field could grow
In the huge GOP presidential field, several candidates seem to be running more for personal benefit
The Republican presidential field has a CEO, a doctor, three senators and one senator-doctor. On Tuesday, when Donald Trump will announce whether he plans to join the bunch, it could get its first reality TV star.

Already, however, the logic of reality TV has had an effect on all their campaigns.

The cast of candidates vying to be president includes some who have joined the race for the same reasons aging sitcom stars put on their dancing shoes and learn to tango. They know they have little chance of winning, but even losing could be good for their careers.

The rise of long-shot, nontraditional candidates is a growing trend, particularly in the recent open Republican contests. None will publicly admit it, but as was true four years ago, several candidates appear to be using the presidential race more as a springboard to television or radio punditry or the speaking circuit than as a contest to actually win office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some need to expand their donor base. Others may walk away with a book deal. All that's required is a healthy ego and few donors.

"You have a category of people who exist in that fuzzy space where celebrity and politics meet in our culture. You've seen, increasingly, a number of those candidates running," said Steve Schmidt, a GOP strategist.

The trend gives some traditionalists pause and some party operatives heartburn as they try to manage a freewheeling and growing field.

To be sure, the party's front-runners – former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker or Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, for example – don't fall into this new group. Some of the second tier – Carly Fiorina or Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina – are viewed as angling for positions in the next GOP administration. And compared with the 2012 field – which included the pizza tycoon Herman Cain and the firebrand conservative Rep. Michele Bachmann – 2016 looks almost staid.

But it's the sheer number of candidates this year that has created problems for Republican officials. Four years ago, the largest candidate debates had eight participants. This year, the party has struggled to find a way to limit the cast to 10 – with the knowledge that some, like Trump, who come with high name recognition, could push aside lesser-known but more substantive hopefuls like Graham.

As Mitt Romney did four years ago, this year's straight-laced candidates will have to learn to run alongside less predictable counterparts.

The Republican National Committee emphasizes the upside to the candidate surge. The field is full of quality candidates, spokeswoman Allison Moore said.

"We have a neurosurgeon, major CEOs, accomplished governors and senators – all are highly talented people and capable of defeating Hillary Clinton," Moore said.

What's more, several of the candidates have agreed to share the data they collect from voters for use during the general election. The more candidates out there making contact, the better for the eventual nominee, party strategists say.

The reason Republicans seem to have attracted more nontraditional candidates than Democrats may be a function of timing. The rise of social media and digital fundraising has coincided with three consecutive open races for the GOP nomination.

"More people are running now frankly because social media allows you to launch a campaign without the funds in the bank or the organization on the ground," said Lee Edwards, an expert on the conservative movement at the Heritage Foundation, who bemoaned the rise of candidates who seem more concerned about their bank accounts than ideology or party politics.

"Some of these candidates are banking on exposure through things like the debate. But also, just because they are candidates, this will, frankly, advance their own careers. We know that if so-and-so is a presidential candidate he can charge a higher fee for speaking, for an article or for a book contract."

The power of conservative media may also play a role. Conservative radio and Fox News have welcomed some media-savvy also-rans with open arms and big paychecks. The model here is former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, whose failed bid in 2008 made him a household name, at least in Republican parts of the country, and landed him a show on Fox News. (Huckabee's show ended in January, when he announced he was exploring another run for president.)

Trump fits into a different category, noted Schmidt, one perhaps only he occupies.

"Politics has always had its showmen, and Donald Trump is a showman," he said, but he's one who taps into a very real sentiment even if he is accused of making a mockery of the process.

"There are substantial parts of the American population who think it's already a joke – that it's fundamentally not on the level," said Schmidt, who in the 2012 campaign referred to that season's GOP candidate debates as "the best reality show on TV."

"A candidate like that has a potential to tap into that in a pretty powerful way. No doubt about it."

2016 elections: GOP looks to train now, campaign later // CNN // Mark Preston - June 16, 2015

Washington - Republicans will convene the first of several political boot camps next month designed to train staffers and volunteers ahead of 2016 -- an election featuring so many races that it will put a strain on the most precious campaign commodity: human capital.

The Republican National Committee's "Republican Leadership Initiative" is a six-week program where activists and fledgling operatives will learn the nuts and bolts of political campaigning from developing strategy to registering voters and community organizing.

The first session of the quarterly program begins in July with the goal of training a "few thousand" people for the 2016 elections, according to an RNC official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the details not yet been publicly unveiled.

The drive by Republicans to bolster its roster of experienced state-based operatives comes as the GOP is preparing for what may be an epic battle with Hillary Clinton for the White House, while at the same time trying to defend its majority in the U.S. Senate. Also on the ballot in 2016: U.S. House seats, state legislative seats and a handful of competitive governor's races.

Of the 11 "battleground" states the RNC official said the program will focus on this summer -- Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Michigan, Nevada, North Carolina, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin -- eight may feature competitive Senate races. The RNC expects to expand the program to more states in the fall.

The six-week program follows on the 2013 recommendations detailed in the Growth and Opportunity Project -- an RNC commissioned report that advised the GOP to modernize its campaign strategy, soften its rhetoric and put greater emphasis on engaging minority communities.

Republicans accepted into this unpaid training program will be asked to commit to between 15 to 30 hours each week for six weeks to learn campaign strategy.

Republicans start to throw some elbows at each other // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 15, 2015

We're nearly through the initial phase of the presidential campaign – we know who's running, who's well positioned to compete, and roughly what the candidates' platforms are going to look like. If this were a literal race, the runners have all effectively taken their place in the starting blocks. The next phrase tends to get a little ... livelier.
On ABC yesterday morning, "This Week" host George Stephanopoulos said, in reference to some of the shots across the candidates' bows, "The gloves are off, I can see that right now." I think that's probably a little premature, but there appears to be one Republican presidential hopeful who's more eager than most to throw some jabs.
Here, for example, is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) going after Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas):

...Christie took aim at 2016 Republican presidential hopeful Sen. Ted Cruz (Texas) on Friday, accusing him and other lawmakers of "hypocrisy" over federal disaster relief. "We have Sen. Cruz, who voted against Sandy relief. Now he says he's got floods in Texas. He says, 'Hey, we need some help down here in Texas.' It's great, right?" Christie said in the early-voting state of Iowa, according to CNN.

And here's Christie taking on Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

"The president's first job has to be to protect the lives of American citizens and yet you have folks, some of whom are running for president, who stood on the floor of the United States Senate and weakened our country, and then sent videos of it to raise money and brag about how much money they raised from it," he said. "To me, that's a disgrace."

And here's Christie going after senators in general:

"Just don't make the wrong vote on the markup in the subcommittee. Is that really who you want to run the country? Someone who has become an expert in not making the wrong vote on the mark-up on the subcommittee? "
How subtle.
To be sure, Christie's not the only one throwing elbows. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) on Friday drew a contrast between "fighters" and "winners," with Republican senators in the former category. "They have yet to win anything and accomplish anything," Walker said.
As political pugilism goes, all of these jabs are pretty mild, and we're still months away from televised attack ads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But let this be a reminder to campaign observers: one of the under-appreciated byproducts of a crowded Republican field is the inevitable crossfire. These GOP candidates have spent the last few months complaining about President Obama and Hillary Clinton, but we're slowly reaching the point at which they start turning on one another – they have primary rivals to dispatch before they can prepare in earnest for the general election. And when these folks do take the gloves off, it's going to get ugly.

Goldman to Move Into Online Consumer Lending // NYT // Michael Corkery & Nathaniel Popper – June 15, 2015

Goldman Sachs has spent 146 years largely as the bank of the powerful and privileged.

Now the Wall Street powerhouse is working on a new business line: providing loans that can help you consolidate your credit card debt or remodel your kitchen.

While the new consumer lending unit is still in the early planning stages, Goldman has ambitious plans to offer loans of a few thousand dollars to ordinary Americans and compete with Main Street banks and other lenders.

The new unit will offer the loans through a website or an app — functioning like a virtual bank in one of the oldest companies on Wall Street. Without the costs of bank branches and tellers, Goldman can lend the money at lower interest rates while still making a profit. The company hopes to be ready to make its first loans next year, people briefed on its plans said.

In devising its new strategy, Goldman is putting itself in league with start-ups that are similarly trying to use technology to disrupt the traditional business of finance. Unlike the media and retail industries, banking has been relatively slow to shed its bricks-and-mortar business model – a trend Silicon Valley and now Goldman are seeking to exploit.

But the new venture carries considerable risks. After the financial crisis, Goldman was vilified, accused of profiting while homeowners lost their properties to foreclosure. If the bank is too hard on its borrowers — suing a struggling family for unpaid debts, for example — it could revive a popular image as a bank that earns profits at the expense of ordinary people.

The lending will also involve Goldman in a relatively risky business in which it has little previous experience, dealing with ordinary borrowers with limited financial cushions.

"Everything Goldman has done in the last 30 to 40 years has all been focused on the commercial side, or things that abut it very closely," said Chris Kotowski, a bank analyst with Oppenheimer & Company. "I refuse to believe that hiring a couple of programmers and offering to make $15,000 loans online is a highly value-added banking strategy."

Still, this new type of lending could help burnish the firm's relevance to mainstream Americans.

The $840 billion consumer loan business is facing a shake-up as online upstarts like Lending Club, Prosper and even PayPal have begun offering small loans.

These outsiders have captured only a tiny slice of the market so far. But with their low overhead, they are persuading some analysts that they will be able to eat away at the businesses of old-school banks with the legacy costs of branches and bank tellers.

Jeffery Harte, a bank analyst at Sandler O'Neill and Partners, said, "Online lending has the potential to be quite disruptive to the way credit is extended."

On Wall Street, Goldman has a reputation for spotting businesses that are being transformed and finding a way to seize the opportunity.

To the degree that Goldman can "assess the risk and price things electronically, it may be a low cost way of getting into the business," Mr. Harte said.

The bank's push into lending is being led by Harit Talwar, a former top executive at the credit card giant Discover, who joined Goldman last month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a sign of how seriously Goldman is treating the new venture, the company approached several top consumer finance executives about the job, which comes with the title of partner, a highly coveted position at Goldman, people briefed on the matter said. The operation could have a staff of as many as 100 by the end of the year, the people said.

In a memo to employees announcing Mr. Talwar's hiring last month, Goldman's chief executive, Lloyd C. Blankfein, and its president, Gary D. Cohn, noted that "the traditional means by which financial services are delivered to consumers and small businesses is being fundamentally reshaped" by technology and the use of data and analytics.

Some of Goldman's traditional business lines are under pressure. Sluggish markets and new regulations have diminished historically profitable areas like trading, forcing Goldman and other Wall Street companies to hunt for new sources of revenue.

Before the financial crisis, Wall Street firms were generally not permitted to do traditional consumer lending because they were not set up as federally insured banks. But as part of the government bailout in the 2008 crisis, Goldman and its archrival, Morgan Stanley, were required to become bank holding companies.

Since 2011, the two banks have talked about increasing their lending and have tripled the amount of outstanding loans — to $42 billion in the case of Goldman. Until now, though, they have focused on providing mortgagesand credit lines to existing, generally very wealthy, clients.

With its new business, Goldman will take a very different approach, offering the types of loans that are traditionally pitched through mailing blasts to American homes.

The firm is probably going to focus on lending to customers who most likely would not come close to the $10 million minimum balance required to become one of Goldman's private wealth clients. The loans would not be backed by collateral like a home or automobile, allowing Goldman to charge higher rates.

"When you are looking around at the universe of asset classes, there is still nothing better than unsecured American consumer debt," said Nick Clements, a former banking executive at Barclays and Citigroup, who co-founded MagnifyMoney, a website that helps borrowers compare credit card and loan offers.

Goldman may eventually lend to small businesses, which have typically struggled to obtain bank loans.

The initial financing for the loans would come from certificates of deposit, which Goldman has been amassing in recent years. As the business grows, the bank may securitize the loans – bundle them and sell them to investors – to reduce some of the risk that it holds on its own books.

Goldman is still considering the details of the loans it will offer. In early discussions, the firm has been talking about making loans that would be about $15,000 to $20,000, people briefed on the conversation said. In terms of distributing the money, Goldman is considering issuing a sort of prepaid card could be drawn down each time the borrower buys something with it.

Goldman has not decided whether to attach its name to the loans or market them under another brand.

Consumer loans can be a fundamentally risky business even for a company with a reputation for deftly managing risk. Many people take out personal loans as a last resort to deal with cash flow problems at home or in their businesses.

"If you grow too fast in the personal loan business, you can get some bad surprises," said William N. Callender, a managing director in the financial services practice of AlixPartners, an advisory firm.

Also, Goldman will have to overcome some powerful forces that favor the incumbent Main Street banks. Even if Goldman can offer lower rates, consumers may still favor credit cards over personal loans, simply out of habit.

"The biggest thing the banks have in their favor is inertia," said Mr. Clements, the former consumer banking executive.

In A.I.G. Case, Surprise Ruling That Could End All Bailouts // NYT // Andrew Sorkin – June 15, 2015

For years, critics of the bailouts during the financial crisis argued that the rescue efforts weren't harsh enough. The chief executives of failing institutions should have lost their jobs. Shareholders should have suffered more pain. Taxpayers should have received substantial compensation for the risk they took.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All that did come to pass in one case: the bailout of the American International Group, the large insurer and symbol of the crisis. Yet on Monday, a judge in Washington decided that the government's actions were too severe, and the rescue was illegal.

When the Federal Reserve propped up A.I.G. in September 2008, unlike its approach with most of the big banks, it threw out the company's chief executive and took control of 79.9 percent of the company, nearly wiping out many of its shareholders. Taxpayers got all of their money back, and then some, receiving a profit of more than $20 billion.

Maurice R. Greenberg, the former chief of A.I.G., argued that the Fed overstepped its bounds.Ex-A.I.G. Chief Wins Bailout Suit, but Gets No DamagesJUNE 15, 2015
But in a stunning ruling, Judge Thomas C. Wheeler of the United States Court of Federal Claims said on Monday that those terms were too "draconian." In other words, he suggested taxpayers should have offered A.I.G. a more generous deal.

The judge's decision could have far-reaching consequences should another financial crisis occur — and if history is any guide, one will. Legal experts say that the ruling, coupled with certain provisions of the Dodd-Frank financial overhaul law enacted after the crisis, makes it unlikely the government would ever rescue a failing institution, even if an intervention was warranted.

Should that happen, and the government decides it is handcuffed by the law from any intervention, taxpayers can thank Maurice Greenberg, the company's former chief executive and one of its largest shareholders. He sued the government on behalf of shareholders, contending its takeover was illegal and unfair to investors. The judge largely sided with Mr. Greenberg, confounding many legal experts who considered the case a long shot. A federal judge had previously thrown the case out of court, calling Mr. Greenberg's accusations "worthy of an Oliver Stone movie."

However, Judge Wheeler had a more sympathetic ear than his peers. He determined that the takeover of A.I.G. was orchestrated to "maximize the benefits to the government and to the taxpaying public." Contrary to the conventional wisdom — and common sense — he said that goal was troubling. "The government's unduly harsh treatment of A.I.G. in comparison to other institutions seemingly was misguided and had no legitimate purpose," he wrote.

Still, the judge did not award any monetary damages to Mr. Greenberg, making it a moral victory, but not an economic one. Mr. Greenberg had sought $40 billion and has spent millions bringing his case.

Judge Wheeler determined that Mr. Greenberg and the other shareholders did not suffer any economic damage because "if the government had done nothing, the shareholders would have been left with 100 percent of nothing." The judge cited John Studzinski, vice chairman of the Blackstone Group and an adviser to A.I.G., who had instructed the board to accept the government's offer in 2008, telling the room of directors: "Twenty percent of something [is] better than 100 percent of nothing."

Inexplicably, that line of logic did not extend to the judge's ruling that the government had unfairly taken advantage of A.I.G. by requiring tough loan terms, including the equity stake and a 12 percent interest rate.

"No matter how rationally A.I.G.'s board addressed its alternatives that night, and notwithstanding that A.I.G. had a team of outstanding professional advisers, the fact remains that A.I.G. was at the government's mercy," the judge wrote.

Judge Paul A. Engelmayer of Federal District Court in Manhattan, who had previously thrown out the case, had said that the claim that A.I.G.'s board was under the control of the government was specious. By the logic of Mr. Greenberg's case, the judge had written, "a loan shark whose usurious interest rate is agreed to by a small business so that it may stay afloat could equally be said to have had actual control over that business so as to compel its agreement to a loan."

"The court bizarrely expressed repeated sympathy for A.I.G. while failing to properly weigh the economic wreckage suffered by the American people," Mr. Kelleher said in an email. "It's the U.S. taxpayers that have been victimized here by A.I.G. when it acted recklessly, precipitated the crash of the financial system, took a $185 billion bailout, and then gave bonuses to some of the very same people who irresponsibly sold the derivatives that blew up the company."

Judge Wheeler's analysis, in comparing how A.I.G.'s rescue was handled relative to the big banks, appears to ignore the realities of the regulatory oversight rules at the time. The judge criticized the government for taking control of A.I.G. while not doing so for the banks. But the Fed did not have regulatory oversight of A.I.G., which is an insurance company, and therefore couldn't maintain the same kind of control it did over the banks. Similarly, the judge criticized the Fed for creating a trust to hold the shares of A.I.G. because the Fed technically can't own equity in companies. “The creation of the trust in an attempt to circumvent the legal restriction on holding corporate equity is a classic elevation of form over substance.”

The government was sticking to its guns on Monday. “The court confirmed today that A.I.G. shareholders were not harmed by those actions,” the Treasury Department said in a statement. “We disagree with the court’s conclusion regarding the Federal Reserve’s legal authority and continue to believe that the government acted well within legal bounds.”

While the ruling is likely to be appealed, possibly all the way to the Supreme Court, the head-scratching decision will undoubtedly have an effect on future bailouts, intended or unintended.

Hester Peirce, a senior research fellow at the Mercatus Center at George Mason University, who is reportedly among the candidates for a Republican seat on the Securities and Exchange Commission, wrote last year that if Mr. Greenberg prevailed in his case, “it would strike a blow to too-big-to-fail by adding to the bailout calculus the specter of subsequent courtroom payouts to allegedly aggrieved shareholders.”

Obama Administration Seeks to Reassure Allies After Trade Rebuke // WSJ // William Mauldin – June 15, 2015

President Barack Obama’s trade czar expressed cautious optimism that Congress will overcome a deep divide over trade legislation, saying he called foreign officials over the weekend to reassure them bipartisan support for a trade package would pave the way for a sweeping trans-Pacific deal.

Mike Froman, the U.S. trade representative, said he has been in touch with a number of U.S. trading partners since a rebellion among Democrats on Friday sank a workers-aid program that was a vital piece of a package that would give Mr. Obama fast-track trade authority.

“Our trading partners are very much watching and assessing where we are,” Mr. Froman said in an interview Monday. “They are looking for signs that we will be able to close the negotiations successfully.”

The House Democratic leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, led most of her party in voting down the workers-aid program, known as trade adjustment assistance, or TAA. House Democrats called the workers-aid program inadequate and improperly funded and opposed it as a way of simultaneously halting the fast-track measure paired with it under House procedural rules.

Mr. Obama is seeking fast-track power, also known as trade promotion authority, so he and Mr. Froman can clinch a 12-nation agreement in the Pacific and later give it to Congress for expedited consideration, without the possibility of amendments. Officials from the other countries have said they don’t want to make painful concessions to seal the Pacific deal without proof the U.S. Congress is on board.

Mr. Froman declined to say what legislative techniques could be used to rescue the trade package, but said he hoped lawmakers understand that voting against the renewal of TAA could hurt workers who depend on the program. “It’s beginning to sink in that that’s now at risk,” he said.

Derailing fast track could further call into question the ability of the U.S. to lead on global economic policy as China is flexing its muscles in the Pacific. The trade agreement under negotiation, known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership, or TPP, includes Japan, Malaysia and Vietnam, but not China.

“This is about the role of the United States in the world,” Mr. Froman said.

After a surprise appearance at the Capitol on Friday, Mr. Obama remains “personally engaged” in the fight for his trade policy, Mr. Froman said.

“We’re quite pleased to see that there are majorities” in both chambers that support the underlying fast-track measure, Mr. Froman said. Even though the fast-track portion got a majority in the House, the measure was derailed anyway due to a procedural mechanism that bound it to the workers-aid program. “There are a number of different options for dealing with it,” he said.

'No One Will Be Negotiating With Leader Pelosi On A Path Forward' // HuffPo // Ryan Grim & Jennifer Bendery – June 15, 2015

House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) has no plans to negotiate with House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) after her caucus torpedoed a trade deal backed by President Barack Obama and Boehner, a GOP leadership aide told The Huffington Post on Monday.

Without talks between Boehner and Pelosi, it's difficult to see how Obama's trade agenda can be revived.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Senate has already passed a trade measure that includes a provision to put future trade deals on a fast track -- known as trade promotion authority, or TPA -- through Congress, and also has set aside funds -- trade adjustment assistance, or TAA -- for workers dislocated by those same deals.

The House needed to pass both provisions for the overall measure to make it to the president's desk. Republicans were unwilling to vote to support the money for workers, but Democrats realized if they, too, rejected the support for workers, the entire package would go down.

On Thursday night, Pelosi and Boehner, who'd been hammering out details of the two packages for days, met on the House floor to swap notes. Pelosi asked Boehner how many votes he could deliver for the funding for dislocated workers. He guessed roughly 100.

"How about 150?" she said, according to sources in both parties.

After the failed vote, Pelosi said a "robust" highway bill could perhaps ease the path to finding the votes needed, but she and Boehner have not been engaged in negotiations, and won't anytime soon.

"After negotiating in bad faith for 3 days and successfully getting the process she demanded for consideration of TAA and TPA, Leader Pelosi turned around and screwed the President and the Speaker. No one will be negotiating with Leader Pelosi on a path forward," a House Republican leadership aide said in a statement to HuffPost.

For now, House Republican leaders simply don't have the votes to pass the trade package and need more time to find them. They plan to take a procedural vote on Tuesday to give themselves until July 30 to come up with a way forward.

“We remain committed to getting TPA done, and this will give the president more time to communicate the consequences of not moving forward with his party," said Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith.

As frustrated as they may be, proponents of the trade deal conceded they may need Pelosi to get it over the finish line.

"You'll have to ask her," grumbled Rep. Ron Kind (D-Wis.), when asked Friday why he thinks his party leader voted against moving the trade package, before adding: "Obviously it's going to be hard to get a TAA bill done without her support."

Boehner's count of 100 was slightly optimistic. At one point during the TAA roll call, Republicans had 93 members voting yes. Once it became clear it was going down, seven switched and voted no. Theoretically, Republicans could pass TAA on their own and assure passage of the TPA bill they desperately want, but many aren't willing to swallow the TAA piece. That means that to get to the 218 votes needed to pass, Democrats would need to provide 125 votes. They only produced 40 votes Thursday.

White House press secretary Josh Earnest downplayed the seriousness of last week's setback, calling it a "legislative snafu" in the House, in what The Wall Street Journal described as "typically oblivious aplomb." He said that the president and others in the White House have been in regular talks to find a way forward.

One of those administration officials making calls was White House chief of staff Denis McDonough, who spoke to Pelosi on Monday. Neither the White House nor Pelosi's office gave details about their conversation.

Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, backed Pelosi's approach to the trade deal during a Sunday speech in Iowa. Clinton said that if the president can't come to terms with House Democratic leader, there should be no deal.

"Here's what I think should happen now," Clinton said. "The president should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with Nancy Pelosi, who have expressed their concerns about the impact that a weak agreement would have on our workers, to make sure we get the best, strongest deal possible and if we don't get it, there should be no deal."

Earnest dismissed the idea that Clinton was out of step with the White House push on trade.

"I think what Secretary Clinton articulated over the weekend is a view that she is neither reflexively in favor of trade agreements nor reflexively against them," said the White House spokesman. "She indicated that her test would be to examine an agreement and determine whether or not it was in the best interest of our national security, and to determine whether or not it was in the best interest of American workers."

A re-enactment of Earnest's statements over the last few days is below.

Uncertainty over US strike against al-Qaida leader in Libya // AP // Sarah El Deeb And Maggie Michael – June 15, 2015

Pentagon officials say they believe they hit their target — the one-eyed, al-Qaida-linked commander who led a deadly attack on an Algerian gas facility in 2013. But uncertainty still surrounds the U.S. airstrike in eastern Libya, and whether Mokhtar Belmokhtar was actually among the militants said to have been killed in the bombing.

Libyan officials say Sunday's airstrike hit a gathering of militants on a farm outside Ajdabiya, a coastal city about 850 kilometers (530 miles) east of the capital, Tripoli, but there were conflicting reports on how many died.

An initial assessment shows the bombing that targeted Belmokhtar was successful, and "post-strike assessments" were still underway Monday to determine whether the Algerian militant was killed, said Col. Steve Warren, a Pentagon spokesman.

"But we're not prepared to confirm that because we haven't finalized our assessment," he said, adding that the strike had hit a "hard structure."

Maj. Mohammed Hegazi, a military spokesman from Libya's internationally recognized government based in the east, also said tests were needed to identify the dead, which numbered at least 17, with their bodies badly burned. Among those killed were three foreigners — a Tunisian and two unidentified militants, he said.

Hegazi criticized his own government for rushing to confirm late Sunday that Belmokhtar was among the dead.

"I don't confirm or deny. We are waiting confirmation," he told The Associated Press by telephone. "It is not easy."

He said the raid was based on solid intelligence that indicated militants forced out of the eastern city of Benghazi by fighting there had taken refuge in Ajdabiya.

No civilians were killed, Hegazi said, adding that the militants took the fatally wounded Tunisian to a hospital in Ajdabiya, clashes erupted with local troops that left three soldiers dead.

In the airstrikes, two F-15 fighter jets had launched multiple 500-pound bombs, a U.S. official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the official was not authorized to discuss details of the attack. Authorities say no U.S. personnel were on the ground for the assault.

A Libyan Islamist with ties to militants said the airstrikes missed Belmokhtar, but killed four members of a Libyan extremist group linked to al-Qaida, Ansar Shariah, in Ajdabiya. That group was tied to the Sept. 11, 2012, attack on the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi that killed Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans.

The Islamist, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal in Libya, told the AP that Belmokhtar wasn't at the site of the airstrike.

However, a news website that has previously carried statements from Belmokhtar said he was in Ajdabiya, meeting with affiliates. The Mauritanian website quoted informed sources in Libya as saying six people were killed in the raid, and a Tunisian and Yemeni were wounded.

Abdel-Basit Haroun, a security adviser to the eastern government, said a total of 29 people were killed in the airstrike, which hit a meeting of al-Qaida affiliates as they tried to "rearrange their ranks."

If Belmokhtar's death is confirmed, it would be a major success for U.S. counterterrorism efforts. He is one of the most-wanted militants in the region, with a $5 million reward for information leading to his capture, and it is not the first time authorities claimed to have killed him.

Believed to be 43 years old, Belmokhtar fought in Afghanistan and was reported to have lost his eye in combat. He was one of a number of Islamist fighters who have battled Algeria's government since the 1990s, later joining al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb, the group's North Africa branch.

He was also known as "Belaouer the One-Eyed," "Abou al-Abbes" and "Mr. Marlboro," because he was accused of smuggling cigarettes through the Sahara and the Sahel region.

He formed his own group and led the January 2013 attack on Algeria's Ain Amenas gas complex that killed at least 35 hostages, including three Americans. He later emerged in Libya, and is believed to have been based in the western and southern parts of the country.

The U.S. filed terrorism charges against Belmokhtar in connection with the Algeria attack. Officials have said they believe he remained a threat to U.S. and Western interests. Belmokhtar had just split off from al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb to start his own franchise.

The charges filed against him by U.S. law enforcement officials included conspiring to support al-Qaida, use of a weapon of mass destruction and conspiring to take hostages.

U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara had said Belmokhtar "unleashed a reign of terror years ago, in furtherance of his self-proclaimed goal of waging bloody jihad against the West."

Intelligence officials said Belmokhtar had essentially built a bridge between AQIM and the underworld, creating a system where various outlaws support each other and enroll youths.

He's been linked to terrorist attacks and the lucrative kidnapping of foreigners in the region.

Libya has been plagued by chaos since the civil war in 2011, which drew in U.S. and European airstrikes that helped topple longtime dictator Moammar Gadhafi. He was killed by armed groups, which have since grown to roil the country in violence.

Recently, the internationally recognized government, backed by its own militias, has been forced out of Tripoli by Islamist militias and their affiliated politicians who set up their own government and parliament.

U.N.-sponsored talks have bogged down as the two sides exchange accusations.

The weekend U.S. bombing raid could cause more disarray among the rival Libyan groups.

A Facebook page associated with Libya Dawn, the Islamist militia backing the Tripoli-based government, denied that the airstrikes targeted al-Qaida and instead said they targeted Islamists who are "Libya's revolutionaries ... considered the safety valve for the revolution." It said U.S. warplanes were allied with the forces led by powerful Gen. Khalifa Hifter and backing the internationally recognized government.

The east-based government hailed the U.S. raid as a "piece of the international support that it has long requested to fight terrorism that represents a dangerous threat to the regional and international situation."

It added that the government would like more help fighting terrorism, including the Islamic State group, which controls Sirte, west of Ajdabiya, and is spreading to the west and south.

Militants have taken advantage of Libya's chaos, with fighters flowing into the country's vast ungoverned spaces.

Al-Qaida militants in eastern Libya are battling the Islamic State group for power and resources. But as IS has grown in power, fueled by successes in Iraq and Syria, some al-Qaida fighters have switched loyalties.

It was not the first time the U.S. has been involved in the fight against Libyan extremists. U.S. special forces went into Tripoli in 2013 and took Abu Anas al-Libi out of the country. Al-Libi, who was accused by the U.S. of involvement in the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa, died in January in a U.S. hospital from a longstanding medical condition.

Pope's climate change encyclical leaks // The Hill // Devin Henry – June 15, 2015

An Italian magazine on Monday posted an early draft version of Pope Francis' highly anticipated environment encyclical, a move that a Vatican official denounced as a "heinous act."

L'Espresso posted the 192-page Italian language document on Monday, four days before the Vatican is planning to release the public version. According to the National Catholic Reporter, the text is an early draft of the encyclical, which is expected to make a moral case for taking on climate change.

A Vatican official told Bloomberg News that the leak is "heinous act," and a spokesman said news organizations should not report on the document until the final version comes out at noon in Rome on Thursday.

"You are invited to respect the journalistic honesty that requests you wait for the official publication of the final text," Jesuit Fr. Federico Lombardi said in a statement, per the National Catholic Reporter.

In the draft, the pope says that human activity is driving climate change, according to a translationby Crux, a Boston Globe website focused on the Catholic issues.

The encyclical calls for "changes in styles of life, of production and consumption, to combat this warming, or, at least, the human causes that produce and exacerbate it."

Francis writes that the Earth “protests for the evil that we’ve caused due to irresponsible use and abuse” of natural resources. He calls for a greater focus on a “sustainable and integral form of development” to combat climate change in the future.

“We grew up thinking we were the earth’s owners and dominators, authorized to pillage it,” Francis writes. “Violence in the human heart wounded by sin shows itself also in the symptoms of disease that we see in the soil, the water, the air and living creatures.”

The document calls climate change “one of the principal challenges now facing humanity," according to Crux, and it asks readers to accept that it's actually happening.

“It’s enough to look at reality with sincerity to see that there’s a great deterioration in our common home,” the encyclical says.

The encyclical, titled "Laudato Si, On the care of the common home,” comes ahead of a major international climate conference later this year. It is Francis’ second encyclical and will be his most thorough discussion of environmental issues to date, though he’s long advocated for a more active role in protecting the environment.

“This encyclical is addressed to all,” Francis said on Sunday. “Let us pray that all receive its message and grow in responsibility towards the common home that God has entrusted to us all."

Hillary Clinton’s first ‘hard choice’ on trade // WaPo // The Editorial Board – June 15, 2015

AFTER WORLD War II, the United States and its allies labored mightily to construct a global freetrade regime. They did so for many reasons, not least to avoid the trade wars that had fueled international tension and, ultimately, global conflict. In other words, trade — and the prosperity and interdependence it engenders — was central to both U.S. economic strategy and U.S. security policy.

Understanding this, and hoping to extend past achievements into the 21st century, President Obama is seeking Trade Promotion Authority from Congress so as to negotiate a consolidation of trade relationships with Pacific Rim nations, the most crucial of which is Japan, to be followed by an agreement deepening U.S. economic ties with Europe. It may be a turning point in contemporary history; if the president succeeds, the United States’ leadership could be strengthened for a generation. If he fails, U.S. influence will ebb, and, with it, American prosperity and security alike.

Of all the people who should be standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Obama at this moment, none could do more to help him than Hillary Clinton, who was an enthusiastic champion of these agreements throughout her tenure as secretary of state. The resistance to Mr. Obama’s trade agenda is led by Democrats in the House who fear that supporting the president will earn them the enmity of organized labor and other progressive groups that simplistically denounce the president’s trade agenda as a threat to jobs and the environment. These Democrats are joined, and validated, in this shortsighted position by Ms. Clinton’s rivals for the Democratic nomination, former governor Martin O’Malley of Maryland and Sen. Bernard Sanders (IVt.).

Think of the bracing effect it might have had on her fellow Democrats if Ms. Clinton had stood up against electionyear political pressure and reiterated what she said as America’s top diplomat in 2012: “that we need to keep upping our game both bilaterally and with partners across the region through agreements like the Trans-Pacific Partnership, or TPP.” Imagine if she had read from her memoir, published just last year under the now ironic title “Hard Choices”: The TPP, Ms. Clinton wrote, “was also important for American workers, who would benefit from competing on a more level playing field. And it was a strategic initiative that would strengthen the position of the United States in Asia.”

Instead, Ms. Clinton broke her silence on the issue only long enough to equivocate about it, or, as she did Monday, to expand on the “legitimate” concerns of opponents of the TPP — and secondguess the president’s strategy. With 18 months to go in his second term, she now advises Mr. Obama to use the House Democrats’ obstruction of Trade Promotion Authority as “leverage” against the 11 negotiating partners; perhaps to reopen it just as the Obama administration spent a couple of years redoing the U.S.Korea trade deal it inherited from the Bush administration.

What this politically unrealistic advice did not include, however, was a simple yes or no to the question of whether Mr. Obama should have the additional bargaining power of Trade Promotion Authority now, as he requests. And that is the question of the hour.

How Obama Abandoned Israel // WSJ // Michael Oren – June 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

‘Nobody has a monopoly on making mistakes.” When I was Israel’s ambassador to the United States from 2009 to the end of 2013, that was my standard response to reporters asking who bore the greatest responsibility—President Barack Obama or Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu—for the crisis in U.S.-Israel relations.

I never felt like I was lying when I said it. But, in truth, while neither leader monopolized mistakes, only one leader made them deliberately.

Israel blundered in how it announced the expansion of Jewish neighborhoods and communities in Jerusalem over the border lines that existed before the Six Day War in 1967. On two occasions, the news came out during Mr. Netanyahu’s meetings with Vice President Joe Biden. A solid friend of Israel, Mr. Biden understandably took offense. Even when the White House stood by Israel, blocking hostile resolutions in the United Nations, settlement expansion often continued.

In a May 2012 Oval Office meeting, Mr. Netanyahu purportedly “lectured” Obama about the peace process. Later that year, he was reported to be backing Republican contenderMitt Romney in the presidential elections. This spring, the prime minister criticized Mr. Obama’s Iran policy before a joint meeting of Congress that was arranged without even informing the president.

Yet many of Israel’s bungles were not committed by Mr. Netanyahu personally. In both episodes with Mr. Biden, for example, the announcements were issued by midlevel officials who also caught the prime minister off-guard. Nevertheless, he personally apologized to the vice president.

Mr. Netanyahu’s only premeditated misstep was his speech to Congress, which I recommended against. Even that decision, though, came in reaction to a calculated mistake by President Obama. From the moment he entered office, Mr. Obama promoted an agenda of championing the Palestinian cause and achieving a nuclear accord with Iran. Such policies would have put him at odds with any Israeli leader. But Mr. Obama posed an even more fundamental challenge by abandoning the two core principles of Israel’s alliance with America.

The first principle was “no daylight.” The U.S. and Israel always could disagree but never openly. Doing so would encourage common enemies and render Israel vulnerable. Contrary to many of his detractors, Mr. Obama was never anti-Israel and, to his credit, he significantly strengthened security cooperation with the Jewish state. He rushed to help Israel in 2011 when the Carmel forest was devastated by fire. And yet, immediately after his first inauguration, Mr. Obama put daylight between Israel and America.

“When there is no daylight,” the president told American Jewish leaders in 2009, “Israel just sits on the sidelines and that erodes our credibility with the Arabs.” The explanation ignored Israel’s 2005 withdrawal from Gaza and its two previous offers of Palestinian statehood in Gaza, almost the entire West Bank and half of Jerusalem—both offers rejected by the Palestinians.

Mr. Obama also voided President George W. Bush’s commitment to include the major settlement blocs and Jewish Jerusalem within Israel’s borders in any peace agreement. Instead, he insisted on a total freeze of Israeli construction in those areas—“not a single brick,” I later heard he ordered Mr. Netanyahu—while making no substantive demands of the Palestinians.

Consequently, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas boycotted negotiations, reconciled with Hamas and sought statehood in the U.N.—all in violation of his commitments to the U.S.—but he never paid a price. By contrast, the White House routinely condemned Mr. Netanyahu for building in areas that even Palestinian negotiators had agreed would remain part of Israel.

The other core principle was “no surprises.” President Obama discarded it in his first meeting with Mr. Netanyahu, in May 2009, by abruptly demanding a settlement freeze and Israeli acceptance of the two-state solution. The following month the president traveled to the Middle East, pointedly skipping Israel and addressing the Muslim world from Cairo.

Israeli leaders typically received advance copies of major American policy statements on the Middle East and could submit their comments. But Mr. Obama delivered his Cairo speech, with its unprecedented support for the Palestinians and its recognition of Iran’s right to nuclear power, without consulting Israel.

Similarly, in May 2011, the president altered 40 years of U.S. policy by endorsing the 1967 lines with land swaps—formerly the Palestinian position—as the basis for peace-making. If Mr. Netanyahu appeared to lecture the president the following day, it was because he had been assured by the White House, through me, that no such change would happen.

Israel was also stunned to learn that Mr. Obama offered to sponsor a U.N. Security Council investigation of the settlements and to back Egyptian and Turkish efforts to force Israel to reveal its alleged nuclear capabilities. Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Netanyahu eventually agreed to a 10-month moratorium on settlement construction—the first such moratorium since 1967—and backed the creation of a Palestinian state. He was taken aback, however, when he received little credit for these concessions from Mr. Obama, who more than once publicly snubbed him.

The abandonment of the "no daylight" and "no surprises" principles climaxed over the Iranian nuclear program. Throughout my years in Washington, I participated in intimate and frank discussions with U.S. officials on the Iranian program. But parallel to the talks came administration statements and leaks—for example, each time Israeli warplanes reportedly struck Hezbollah-bound arms convoys in Syria—intended to deter Israel from striking Iran pre-emptively.

Finally, in 2014, Israel discovered that its primary ally had for months been secretly negotiating with its deadliest enemy. The talks resulted in an interim agreement that the great majority of Israelis considered a "bad deal" with an irrational, genocidal regime. Mr. Obama, though, insisted that Iran was a rational and potentially "very successful regional power."

The daylight between Israel and the U.S. could not have been more blinding. And for Israelis who repeatedly heard the president pledge that he "had their backs" and "was not bluffing" about the military option, only to watch him tell an Israeli interviewer that "a military solution cannot fix" the Iranian nuclear threat, the astonishment could not have been greater.

Now, with the Middle East unraveling and dependable allies a rarity, the U.S. and Israel must restore the "no daylight" and "no surprises" principles. Israel has no alternative to America as a source of security aid, diplomatic backing and overwhelming popular support. The U.S. has no substitute for the state that, though small, remains democratic, militarily and technologically robust, strategically located and unreservedly pro-American.

The past six years have seen successive crises in U.S.-Israeli relations, and there is a need to set the record straight. But the greater need is to ensure a future of minimal mistakes and prevent further erosion of our vital alliance.

Hillary Clinton is owning the joke about her fashion choices — and it's working // WaPo // Robin Givhan - June 16, 2015

Hillary Clinton, candidate for president, has been making jokes about fashion. They have not exactly been rib-cracking laugh lines, but they have been knowing, droll, even a bit silly. But mostly, they have not been defensive.

Instead, Clinton has gone on the offensive by finding humor in her fashion foibles and beauty regimen. Sometimes she takes up the shtick of her critics and makes it her own. Or she recognizes the joke and tells it before others have the chance. She long ago found a timeless aesthetic that works for her: pantsuit (preferably with matching blouse), blond bob, statement necklace, sensible heels. Now she has taken full ownership of it.

The fashion monster has — for the moment — been wrestled into submission. Clinton stands victorious.
Is this pantsuit blue enough for you? (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)
She put the stake in her tormentor on Roosevelt Island as she delivered her first big campaign speech. There she stood, in her new royal blue silk suit, making cracks about dyeing her hair.

"All our Presidents come into office looking so vigorous. And then we watch their hair grow grayer and grayer," Clinton said. "Well, I may not be the youngest candidate in this race. But I will be the youngest woman president in the history of the United States! And the first grandmother as well. And one additional advantage: You're won't see my hair turn white in the White House. I've been coloring it for years!"

The image of her against a backdrop of cerulean blue sky and flag-waving throngs combined with the cheeky comment about her hair to make a statement about comfort, familiarity and confidence — at least in the realm of public presentation. Here was Clinton laughing about her hair in a manner that was not the usual wry and grumpy remark about the pressures on women to be young, thin and Barbie-doll attractive. ("Your hair will send significant messages to those around you," she said, mockingly during a Class Day speech at Yale in 2001. "What hopes and dreams you have for the world, but more, what hopes and dreams you have for your hair. Pay attention to your hair, because everyone else will.")

Saturday's was a different kind of comment. It acknowledged a bit of vanity, indulgence and stage craft. It was an Everywoman comment — self-conscious to be sure, but not fraught with feminist theory.

The light-hearted observation took direct aim at a topic raised by conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh during the 2008 campaign: "Will Americans want to watch a woman get older before their eyes on a daily basis? And that woman, by the way, is not going to want to look like she's getting older, because it will impact poll numbers. It will impact perceptions. In politics, perceptions are reality."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's joke addressed that question before it could become an issue, again. Because surely it would.

And yes, blond hair is high-maintenance, in case you were wondering or perhaps had forgotten. But you don't want to witness the alternative, do you?

Clinton's suit was designed by Ralph Lauren, who is known for his celebration and elevation of Americana. The label that has been worn by those who summer in exclusive New England enclaves, as well as those who spent their July and August only dreaming about such luxuries. Lauren, a self-made man, donated $13 million in 1998 to preserve the original Star-Spangled Banner hung at Fort McHenry in 1814. In 2014, he received the James Smithson Bicentennial Medal for his patriotism and philanthropy during a ceremony at the National Museum of American History. Could there be a better example of bootstrapping, entrepreneurial all-American success? Clinton was there for the occasion — wearing an eerily similar suit also designed by Lauren in cobalt blue silk. According to the folks at Ralph Lauren, the Roosevelt Island ensemble was new. But really, who could tell other than Clinton herself? For a campaign that's putting its senior staff on the Vamoose bus, Clinton could have made a sly nod to frugality. On her biggest campaign event so far, she could have shopped her closet. Instead, she had her own private little fashion moment.

Clinton has done more than reach détente with fashion. Fashion is now working for her — as a pleasure, an aesthetic proposition, as well as a campaign symbol. After years of dabbling in Donna Karan and St. John Collection, contact lenses and headbands, skirts and millinery, she finally said "enough." In 2012, while Secretary of State, she faced the public in an official capacity without makeup and wearing her once-maligned eyeglasses. Observers commented and debated the professionalism of her appearance. She did not look bad, although she certainly appeared tired. She eschewed the standard accouterments of the female professional class. When asked about her natural look, she laughed and noted she'd reached a stage in life when she felt empowered to dress as she pleased. Not to flout civility and good manners, but to make choices that more honestly represented her. Indeed, admitting that she had made a considered decision about her appearance — and decided to ignore all the unwritten rules — was a kind of victory for personal style in the political realm.

Clinton is now using her much-discussed and undiminished love of a brightly-colored pantsuit as a fundraising device. From her Senate campaign to her first presidential race, she has made cracks about her affection for the practical ensemble. In speeches, she referred to "my sisterhood of the traveling pantsuits." In multiple appearances on "The Late Show with David Letterman," they were reliable fodder for a chuckle. And in informal settings, off-hand comments about them served as icebreakers.

The cracks about her pantsuits framed her as a no-frills, serious-minded politician with a uniform — albeit one that came in every color of the rainbow. It often seemed as though she delighted in these jokes because they set her outside the realm of fashion. They gave her a pass when it came to considerations of her style.

In her second presidential campaign, she's still wearing the pantsuits and she's still making jokes, but this time the jokes are aimed to cash in. Supporters can purchase a red "everyday pantsuit tee," with its tromp l'oeil print of a blazer, for $30.

To deflect the barbs about her style, Clinton used comedy as a defense. But through the jokes and the one-liners, she built her own fashion vocabulary. She found a way of talking about her personal aesthetics. And she's pointedly redefining them on the public stage.

Why Jim Webb Is the Most Interesting Candidate in the Democratic Primary // The Observer // Jimmy Soni – June 15, 2015

What is the point of the Democratic primary?

For the media, the point is figuring out how to make the inevitable interesting. For Hillary Clinton, the point is to make it through Super Tuesday with a minimum of drama and damage.

Ask Jim Webb that question, though, and you're likely to get an answer befitting someone who morphed from a Reagan Republican to an Elizabeth Warren Democrat; who entered an unwinnable Senate race in 2006 and won; who gave one of the only successful State of the Union responses in recent memory; who got bored of the Senate and quit to write books; and who became the first member of his party to explore the 2016 presidential race, with a longshot, shoestring campaign that's still waiting for traction. As Webb put it in his latest book, "All I have asked, as the ancient philosopher intoned, is not to be understood too quickly."

In other words: it's complicated.

It's complicated by the fact that Webb fits uncomfortably into his party's ideological boxes, and by the fact that the Vietnam veteran and ex-Navy Secretary enjoys politics about as much as the average low-information voter. Yet I'm convinced that Jim Webb is going to make noise this election season. Let's not expect him to derail the Clinton juggernaut—but let's be thankful that the Democratic primary is going to give one of the most interesting people in politics a public stage.

Yes, Webb is polling at around 1 percent right now. But here's why that number is going up.

He was Elizabeth Warren before it was cool.

It's clear that the Clinton-Warren showdown that much of the Democratic base has been pining for is not going to happen. That means Warren's defining issues—economic fairness, record inequality, and the political power of big finance—are up for grabs, and Webb is well-positioned to put them at the center of his campaign.

As early as 2006, he was calling out economic elites in the kind of blistering language that seems to have anticipated Warren's appeal: "The most important—and unfortunately the least debated—issue in politics today is our society's steady drift toward a class-based system, the likes of which we have not seen since the 19th century. America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years. It is not unfair to say that they are literally living in a different country." In the Senate, he supported a tax on bonuses for executives whose companies received government bailouts, as well as a higher capital gains tax.

Whatever you think of that version of economic fairness, it strikes a serious chord with the Democratic base. Can Clinton capitalize on it? She can try. But economic populism is always going to sit awkwardly on a politician with Clinton's personal wealth and ties to the financial industry. Webb isn't impoverished by any stretch—but he's a lot closer to the rest of us than Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush.

He can broaden his party's appeal.

It's true that other would-be Clinton challengers, like Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, are running to her left on the economy. But while they share the culture of East Coast, urban liberalism, a Virginian like Webb comes out of a different tradition—the Southern populism that was once the Democratic party's backbone. Dave "Mudcat" Saunders, a Democratic strategist who's still close to Webb, put it this way: "His constituency is people who feel like they're getting screwed."

If working-class, white voters represent the Achilles heel of the current Democratic coalition, Webb is the candidate best placed to bring them into the fold. Part of that is a question of symbolic signifiers, like the combat boots Webb famously wore during his Senate campaign, in honor of his son, who was deployed in Iraq. But it's also his own military service, which resonates heavily in rural America. Along with Rick Perry and Lindsey Graham, Webb is one of just three 2016 candidates with military experience. But Webb is by far the most decorated: he returned from Vietnam with a Navy Cross, two Purple Hearts, a Silver Star, two Bronze Stars, and shrapnel that he still carries in his body.

Beyond that, Webb's service in the Reagan administration and his positions on issues like gun control and immigration, which are to the right of his party's liberal mainstream, could make him competitive in states that haven't been in the blue column since the days of Bill Clinton. At the very least, he's capable of pinning down the very fickle blueness of Virginia and continuing Barack Obama's inroads into North Carolina, two huge states for Democrats in 2016. Webb's ability to expand the electoral map is worth taking seriously in an election year when Republican frontrunners like Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio (and VP hopefuls like John Kasich) stand a strong chance of making gains in Democratic territory.

He has unmatched credibility on foreign policy.

At the center of Hillary Clinton's case for the presidency is the fact that she's tough and tested, a politician who's truly been through the wringer and come out standing. But just as Webb's economic views capture part of Warren's populism, his time in government and the military captures part of Clinton's tenacity and experience.

Make what you will of the value of "executive experience," but actual time inside the belly of the federal government can make a real difference. A huge part of the president's power comes from his or her ability to push and prod the executive bureaucracy—especially in the current partisan environment, where the president's influence over legislation is limited. Skill at navigating byzantine bureaucracies isn't the sexiest campaign selling point, but it's an underrated asset and one that Webb can credibly claim as a former Assistant Secretary of Defense and Secretary of the Navy.

Granted, Webb wasn't especially long-lived in the latter post—he resigned in protest of a plan to cut the size of the fleet—but we shouldn't underestimate the importance of his time in and around the military to his foreign policy judgments. Remember, he opposed President Bush's Iraq war and President Obama's intervention in Libya, which helped topple a dictator but set off a spiral of civil bloodshed. Clinton, on the other hand, arguably got both of those calls wrong.

But credibility on foreign policy issues is about more than just casting the right votes. As Navy veteran Ken Harbaugh wrote at Time.com, “Presidents with military experience, especially in combat roles, have undergone the kind of test that politics cannot match. As Commanders-in-Chief, they carry with them real empathy, the kind that cannot be faked, towards the men and women they will inevitably send into harm’s way.” Webb is the only contender in the race who has seen combat, the only one you could imagine saying, as Dwight Eisenhower once said, “I hate war as only a soldier who has lived it can.” (Though Webb would probably give you an ugly look if you called him a soldier instead of a Marine.)

Consider the citation for Webb’s Silver Star. In 1969, on a search and destroy mission deep behind enemy lines, First Lieutenant Webb attacked two bunkers and apprehended three enemy soldiers, seemingly on his own. As the assault continued, he approached a third bunker and was preparing to fire into it when the enemy threw another grenade. Observing the grenade land dangerously close to his companion, First Lieutenant Webb simultaneously fired his weapon at the enemy, pushed the Marine away from the grenade, and shielded him from the explosion with his own body. Although sustaining painful fragmentation wounds from the explosion, he managed to throw a grenade into the aperture and completely destroy the remaining bunker.

But as heroic as that was, does it matter today? I think it does. The president decides when and whether to send people to fight and die overseas, and the next president will become a wartime leader the second he or she takes the oath. There’s a moral authority in being able to say to the soldiers under their command, “I’m not asking you to do what I haven’t done. I’ve been there.”

He hates politics.

From Ross Perot to John McCain in his more candid moments, Americans have long had a thing for anti-politicians. Anti-politicians can still run for office—it’s just that they aren’t defined by vote-chasing and poll-watching. Like the kid in the back of the class shooting spitballs, the anti-politician appeals to the rebels, scares the establishment, and makes the rest of us pay attention.

In a field of political animals, that’s perhaps Webb’s defining characteristic. He left the Senate because, he said, “I faced the Hobson’s choice of either turning into a perennial scold or surrendering a part of my individuality to the uncontrollable, collective nature of group politics. I was not ready to do either.” The constant campaigning, the fundraising, the glad-handing and backslapping—Webb viscerally hates it. And that puts him in league with the many millions of Americans who can’t stand politics for the same reasons. Anti-politicians aren’t good at measuring their words or securing wealthy backers for their runs—but they are good at connecting with the anti-political public in an instantly credible way. When it comes to Washington dysfunction, someone like Webb can take a believable position above the fray.

Perhaps that’s why Webb’s ideological hodgepodge is something of an asset. There are large swathes of voters whose own views are weakly represented by either party—blue-collar workers who are falling behind economically but hold to traditional social values, or libertarian-ish millennials who want less regulation and more gay marriage. A candidate like Webb couldn’t possibly speak to all of those views, but he can speak to the sense of being dissatisfied with our standard-issue ideologies, of choosing a set of beliefs without the usual calculations. No, that’s not a formula for winning a primary. But it is a formula for looking a bit more like a “normal” person in a field of political lifers.

He’s the closest to “normal” of any candidate in the race.

This, it seems to me, is the core of Webb’s appeal: politics is part of his life, but it’s not his entire life. In this day and age, it may be too much to ask that our politicians be the kind of people we can comfortably have a beer with, but I don’t think it’s too much to ask that our leaders have done something—anything—outside the narrow world of politics and government.

And yet look at the field. Hillary Clinton has been on the national stage for a generation. Politics is the Bush family business, and Jeb was born into it. Marco Rubio and Scott Walker have had essentially no other careers but politics. Sure, Webb is a politician, too, but he’s also lived a full, varied, non-political life. He hasn’t plotted his every move on the basis of how it might look to voters; if anything, he seems to have done the opposite. Remember, this is a guy who twice held high office—and twice gave it up: he resigned as Secretary of the Navy, and he chose not to run for re-election after only one term in the Senate.

Seeing all this, you get the sense that part of him would rather not be in politics at all. Were one of his better-funded, better-organized, better-known opponents to win the primary, you get the feeling that he’d simply shrug his shoulders and move on. Which means that, more than any of his rivals, he’s a candidate with nothing to lose. That’s good, because he is going to lose. But whether because of a sharp performance in a debate, a surprise showing in a primary state, or sheer Clinton fatigue, Webb is going to have his moment in the spotlight. And whether it’s by speaking out for the constituency of “screwed” Americans, calling attention to the issues of criminal justice reform he’s been working on for a decade, or criticizing the drift of our foreign policy, the point of Webb's campaign is making the most of that moment when it comes.
